

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Princeton University Library

32101 066128834

268
913
2

ANNEX LIB.

5269
913

Library of the College of New Haven.

Purchased in 189

B. J.

~~XXXI 1364-11~~

STUDIES IN THE GOSPELS.

STUDIES IN THE GOSPELS.

BY

RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D.

ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN.

NEW YORK:

CHARLES SCRIBNER & COMPANY.

1867.

(Published by arrangement with the Author.)

•

PREFACE.

SOME Studies on the Gospels are here offered to the reader. I have never been able to consent with that which so often is asserted—namely, that the Gospels are in the main plain and easy, and that all the chief difficulties of the New Testament are to be found in the Epistles. There are, indeed, by the gracious provision of God, abundance of plain things—so plain that no wayfarer, who seeks his waymarks, need err for lack of such,—alike in these and in those. But when we begin to set the hard things of one portion of Scripture against the hard things of another, I cannot admit that they have right who assume it as lifted above all doubt that those of the Epistles infinitely surpass those of the Gospels. How often the difficulties of the Epistles are merely difficulties of form; not of the thought, but of the setting forth of the thought; of the logical sequence, which only requires a patient disentangling, and all is comparatively clear. But in the Gospels it is not the form of the thought, for that for the most part presents little or nothing perplexing, but the thought itself, the divine fact

5268
.913
2

(RECAP)

27993

or statement, which itself constitutes the difficulty. Nor, if I am right in affirming it to be so, is this in any way strange. For while there must be deep things everywhere in Scripture, things past man's finding out, else it were no revelation, surely it is nothing surprising that the Son of God, who moved in all worlds as in regions familiar to Him, who was not the illuminated, but the Illuminator of all others, not inspired, but the Inspirer, should utter the words of widest range and mightiest reach, those which should most task even the enlightened spirit of man to understand. Believing that it is thus with his words, that they must be at once the highest and the deepest of all, that in his life there must be mysteries which find only their remote resemblances in the lives of any other, I have often regretted that those who in our time and Church have brought the choicest gifts to the interpretation of the New Testament, have either restricted themselves to the elucidation of the Epistles, as if these alone would offer sufficient resistance to them; or where their work has embraced both, have wrought out this latter portion of it with far more of thought and toil than the earlier. Surely there are hard questions enough suggested by the Sermon on the Mount, if only we would learn to look at it a little less superficially than now is our wont, questions which have never yet received an entirely satisfactory solution. So, too, in the great Prophecy from the Mount there are knots, which, to my mind at least, have never been perfectly untied. Neither is the solemn judgment scene with which the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew closes altogether so easy as it seems. The limpid clearness of St. John's style conceals from us often the profundity of the thought, as the perfect clearness of waters may altogether deceive us about their depth; and we may thus be too lightly tempted to conclude that while St. Paul may be hard, St. John at all events is easy. I believe this to be very far from the case.

These Studies, written for the most part some years ago, are the fruit of this conviction; not that in them I have gone out of my way to seek the hard passages in the Gospels, although I have not shunned such. They are the fragments of a much larger scheme, in which I had not advanced far before I saw plainly that I could never hope to complete it; and which I thereupon laid aside. Gathering up lately a portion of what I had written, for publication, I have given it as careful a revision as my leisure would allow, have indeed in many parts rewritten it, seeking to profit by the results of the latest criticism, as far as I have been able to acquaint myself with them. For my labours I shall be abundantly repaid, if now, when so many controversies are drawing away the Christian student from the rich and quiet pastures of Scripture to other fields, not perhaps barren, but which can yield no such nourishment as these do, I shall have contributed aught to detain any among them.

PALACE, DUBLIN:
March 8, 1867.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
1. THE TEMPTATION	1
2. THE CALLING OF PHILIP AND NATHANAE	66
3. CHRIST AND THE SAMARITAN WOMAN	83
4. THE SONS OF THUNDER	138
5. WISDOM JUSTIFIED OF HER CHILDREN	147
6. THE THREE ASPIRANTS	156
7. THE NEW PIECE ON THE OLD GARMENT, AND THE NEW WINE IN THE OLD VESSELS	168
8. THE TRANSFIGURATION	184
9. JAMES AND JOHN OFFERING TO CALL FIRE FROM HEAVEN ON THE SAMARITAN VILLAGE	215
10. THE RETURN OF THE SEVENTY	225
11. THE PHARISEES SEEKING TO SCARE THE LORD FROM GALILEE	237
12. THE UNFINISHED TOWER AND THE DEPRECATED WAR	246
13. ZACCHÆUS	262
14. THE TRUE VINE	273
15. THE PENITENT MALEFACTOR	287
16. CHRIST AND THE TWO DISCIPLES ON THE WAY TO EMMAUS	313

STUDIES IN THE GOSPELS.

I. THE TEMPTATION.

Matt. iv. 1—11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1—13.

OF the Temptation of our Lord we possess three records : two more full, in the first and third Gospels, one more summary, in the second. St. John has no report of it, and indeed no allusion to it, except indeed we are to find one in the words of Christ, 'The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me' (xiv. 30); though, of course, even then the reference could not be exclusively to it; but only to it as the supreme moment in which 'the prince of this world' wrought his worst, that so he might have 'something' in Him, as through sin he has something in every other child of Adam. Origen (on Matt. xxvii. 32) calls attention to the fact that, with all the significance which the Temptation possesses, occupying as it does a place in the foreground of two Gospels and, although more briefly, of a third, no place has been found for it, any more than for the Transfiguration, in the fourth. He suggests as a reason for this omission that it did not belong to the theology, using this term in its strictest sense; not, that is, to the divine, but rather to the human, aspect of Christ's person and work; He being tempted not as He was God, who cannot be tempted with evil (Jam. i. 13), but as He was man. It cohered therefore intimately with the predominant purpose and aim of the three earlier Gospels that the Temptation should find a place in them, with the intention of the fourth that it should be absent there.

Assuredly Origen is right in starting with the assumption that some explanation is to be looked for; that there is nothing of haphazard in the admissions and exclusions of the several Evangelists; that a prevailing idea in each Gospel accounts for what it has, and what it has not; and why it has, or has not, this or the other incident or discourse. Indeed I am persuaded that, notwithstanding all which has been already accomplished, devout students of Scripture may for a long time to come find an ample, almost inexhaustible, field of study in the tracing out in each the operation of this ever active law of exclusion and inclusion. At the same time we need not look so far as he has looked for an explanation of the important fact which he has thus noted; and which, indeed, almost all must have observed. The record of the Temptation in the previous Gospels does not to me make strange the omission of it in St. John's, but rather accounts for it; seeing that his Gospel was certainly intended to be supplementary to those which went before; not to go over ground which they had sufficiently gone over already; but to treasure up precious aspects of the life of Christ, of his words and works, which they had passed by. Such was the spiritual opulence of that life that only so, only through a 'four-sided Gospel,' as Origen himself has called it, could that life be adequately presented to the Church: This supplementary character of St. John's Gospel, when once admitted, at once explains why he did not relate what those who went before him had so fully related.

This history of our Lord's Temptation in the wilderness ought never to be contemplated apart from that of his Baptism. It is certain, at least, that we shall miss much of its significance, if we dissociate it even in thought from the solemn recognition of the Son by the Father, and salutation of Him from heaven, with which the Evangelical History in all its three narratives has knit it so closely (Matt. iii. 16, 17; Mark i. 9-11; Luke iii. 21, 22). The Church of old did not shrink from calling her Lord's Baptism his second nativity.¹ It is true, indeed, that when some of the early sects made it his first divine nativity (and Ebionites and Gnostics,² opposed in so much else, had a common interest in this), she then fell back upon the mightier fact, the Incarnation, in the assertion of which alone she felt herself to possess a Son of God in any but a deceptive and merely illusory sense. The Baptism may thus have fallen somewhat out of sight, and not come to its full honours, or to all the prominence which, except for these disturbing causes, it would have obtained.

It is not however here my part to consider the Baptism more than under a single aspect, namely, in its connection with the Temptation. The Son in that Baptism had received his heavenly armour, and now He goes forth to prove it, and try of what temper it is. Having been baptized with water and the Holy Ghost, He shall now be baptized with the fire of temptation; even as there is another baptism, the baptism of blood (Matt. xx. 22), in store for Him: for the gifts of God are not for the Captain of our salvation any more than for his followers the pledge of exemption from a conflict, but rather powers with which He is furnished, and, as it were, inaugurated thereunto;¹ and thus that word with which the Temptation is introduced, 'Then was Jesus led into the wilderness,' a word which links this event so closely with the Baptism, is much more than a mere 'then,' designating succession of time; for indeed it denotes rather the divine order in which the events of the Saviour's life followed one another, and is intended to call our attention to this.

¹ See a sermon to this effect which used to be ascribed to Augustine, but which the Benedictine Editors have rightly adjudged to the Appendix (Serm. 135), in which this is strongly set forth, pushed almost to a perilous excess.

² The followers of Basilides, as Clemens of Alexandria tells us (Strom. i. 21), kept a feast of the Baptism, which they ushered in with a night spent in the reading of the Scriptures.

And as with the Baptism, so also with the Temptation. We cannot estimate too highly the importance of the victory which was then gained by the second Adam, or the bearing which it had, and still has, on the work of our redemption. Milton showed that he had a true feeling of this, when he wrote a poem which contained nothing more than a history of this victoriously surmounted temptation, and called it Paradise Regained; setting it, as the story of the second Adam's victory, over against Paradise Lost, or the story of the first Adam's defeat. It is not too much to say, as Augustine said often, that the entire history, moral and spiritual, of the world revolves around two persons, Adam and Christ.¹ To Adam was given a position to maintain; he did not maintain it, and the lot of the world for ages was decided. And now with the second Adam the second trial of our race has arrived. All is again at issue. Again we are represented by a Champion, by One who is in the place of all,—whose standing shall be the standing of many, and whose fall, if that fall had been conceivable, would have been the fall of many, yea of all. Once already Satan had thought to nip the kingdom of heaven in the bud, and had nearly succeeded. If it had not been for a new and unlooked-for interposition of God, for the promise of the Seed of the woman, he would have done it. He will now prove if he cannot more effectually crush it, and for ever. Then, on that first occasion, there was still a reserve, the pattern according to whom Adam was formed; who should come forth in due time to make what Adam had marred;—but He failing, there was none behind; the last stake would have been played,—and lost.

¹ As Chrysostom (Hom. 13 in Matt.) well says here: καὶ γὰρ διὰ τοῦτο ἐλαβες ὅπλα, οὐχ ἵνα ἀργῇς, ἀλλ' ἵνα πολεμῇς.

‘Then was Jesus led of the Spirit into the wilderness.’ If it be asked, of what Spirit He was thus led, undoubtedly of the Spirit of God—in the words of Jeremy Taylor, ‘He was led by the good Spirit to be tempted of the evil.’ Some few have understood it otherwise, and that it was the same evil Spirit who afterwards encountered Him in the wilderness, who first led Him thither.² But this is certainly a mistake. We have here

¹ Op. Imp. Con. Jul. ii. 163: Unde fit ut totum genus humanum quodammodo sint homines duo, primus et secundus. Serm. 90: Venit unus contra unum; contra unum qui sparsit unus qui collegit . . . Homo et homo; homo ad mortem, et homo ad vitam.

² See Spanheim, Dub. Evan., L. They have often found an argument in one, and of course the most signal and transcendent, of those stirrings from the Spirit of God to some heroic achievement whereof we have many anticipations in lower forms of the spiritual life in the Old Testament, as in Moses (Acts vii. 23), in Gideon (Judg. vi. 34), in Samson (Judg. xiii. 25; xiv. 19). The Captain of our salvation went into the wilderness, drawn by another, but at the same time freely; in the words of one of the Schoolmen, as an athlete going of his own accord,¹ or, to cite Jeremy Taylor once more, 'not by an unnatural violence, but by the efficacies of inspiration, and a supernatural inclination and activity of resolution.'

The scene of the Temptation was the 'wilderness.' What wilderness we are not told;² and all which it imports us to note is that it was a wilderness, in which this encounter of the good and the evil, each in its highest representative, found place. There could have been no fitter scene, nor so fit. The waste and desert places of the earth are, so to speak, the characters which sin has visibly impressed on the outward creation; its signs and its

the αὐτὸν ἐκβάλλει of Mark i. 12, as though no such violent driving or thrusting forth as this word implies could have been ascribed to the Holy Spirit. There is no force in the argument. 'Εκβάλλειν in Hellenistic use continually signifies not a violent thrusting out, but an orderly putting forth. Thus, 'Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth (ἵνα ἐκβάλῃ) labourers into his harvest' (Matt. ix. 38); the householder bringeth forth (ἐκβάλλει) out of his treasure new and old (Matt. xiii. 52; cf. John x. 4; Jam. ii. 25); and with this milder use of the word agree the ἀνέχθη and the ἤγετο by which St. Matthew and St. Luke severally describe the bringing of the Lord upon the scene of his temptation.

¹ Quasi athleta sponte procedens (Aquinas).

² Tradition places the scene of the Temptation in 'the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho' (Josh. xvi. 1; cf. Josephus, Antt. x. 8. 2), which extended a great part of the way to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 12), and fixes it more immediately on a steep and rugged mountain rising like a wall of rock from the plain, and subsequently called Quarantana, from the quarantain, or forty days of fasting, which the Lord had there observed.

symbols there; the echoes in the outward world of the desolation and wasteness which sin has wrought in the inner life of men. Out of a true feeling of this men have ever conceived of the wilderness as the haunt of evil spirits. In the old Persian religion Ahriman and his evil spirits inhabit the steppes and wastes of Turan, to the north of the happy Iran, which stands under the dominion of Ormuzd; exactly as with the Egyptians, the evil Typhon is the lord of the Libyan sand-wastes, and Osiris of the fertile Egypt.¹ This sense of the wilderness as the haunt of evil spirits, one which the Scripture more or less allows (Matt. xii. 43; Isai. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14; Rev. xviii. 2), would of itself give a certain fitness to that as the place of the Lord's encounter with Satan; but only in its antagonism to Paradise or the Garden, do we see yet higher fitness in the appointment of the place. The garden and the desert are the two most opposite poles of natural life; in them we have the highest harmonies and the deepest discords of nature. It was just that the first Adam, so long as he stood in his original uprightness, should be a dweller in the Garden; that his outward surroundings should correspond to his inner life, that there should be no disagreement between them; and it was there, in the garden of Eden, that his temptation went forward. Being worsted in the conflict, he was expelled therefrom; and he and that race whose destinies were linked with his, should henceforth inhabit an earth which was cursed for his sake.² It is true, indeed, that in this as in so much else the curse was in part mercifully lightened, and the earth was not all desert; yet for all this its desert places do evermore represent to us what the whole of it might justly have been; the curse concentrates itself upon them. The second Adam therefore, taking up the conflict exactly where the first had left it, and inheriting all the consequences of his defeat, in the desert does battle with the foe; and conquering him there, wins back the garden for that whole race, whose champion and representative in this conflict He had been. And this is not the less true, however as yet that garden blooms not again; or blooms only in part; for in the higher culture and more complete subduing to the needs and delights of men, of those regions where the faith of Christ is owned, we may see already pledges and promises of that complete restoration of the earth to all its original fertility and beauty, which Christ's victory over Satan in the wilderness shall one day have brought about.

¹ Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. i. p. 223.

² Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. iv. 7): Convenit recordari quemadmodum de paradiso in desertum Adam primus ejectus sit; ut advertas quemadmodum de deserto ad paradisum Adam secundus reverterit . . . In deserto Adam, in deserto Christus; sciebat enim ubi posset invenire damnatum, quem ad paradisum, resoluta errore, revocaret.

While we are upon this point, it is worthy of note that St. Mark, briefly as he records the Temptation (and two verses are all that he affords to it, i. 12, 13), yet gives us an intimation which we should look for in vain in the fuller accounts of the other Evangelists, and one which we should not slightly or carelessly pass over. His record of this event, in its summary brevity as compared with theirs, is very like his record of the Lord's appearance to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus (xvi. 12, 13) as compared with that of St. Luke (xxiv. 13-34). Not indeed that this is always his manner; for brief as his Gospel is on the whole, he can relate events with far greater breadth than either St. Matthew or St. Luke; as witness his account of the healing of the Gadarene demoniac

(v. 1-20), and of the lunatic boy (ix. 14-20), compared with theirs. On the present occasion he tells us of the Lord that, being in the wilderness, 'He was with the wild beasts' (ver. 13). Now this notice is certainly not introduced, as many interpreters would have us to believe, merely to enhance the waste desolation and savage solitude of that scene, but at once throws us back, as it was intended to throw us back, on the Paradisiacal state which in the second Adam had bloomed anew. 'He was with the wild beasts'—which owned Him for their rightful Lord; He was with them, as Adam had been before he sinned. In Him, the second Adam, the ideal man of the eighth Psalm, the Adamic prerogatives, lost and suspended so long, after the Deluge only partially recovered (Gen. ix. 2) fully reappeared (cf. Gen. i. 26, 28 with Ps. viii.).¹ The Apocryphal Gospels, whose marvellous is in general merely the monstrous, and which so seldom portray the divine Child with any traits which are really divine, are not here so remote at once from ideal and from historic truth, as is commonly their case. One of these tells of the Child Jesus that in his flight to Egypt the lions and the leopards played harmlessly about Him, and accompanied Him upon his way.²

This resumption of dominion by the second Adam over the revolted animal world should be more or less continued in his saints. They too should 'take up serpents' (Mark xvi. 18); should tread on serpents and scorpions (Luke x. 19), so reversing the threat of Jeremiah viii. 17; Paul should shake the venomous beast from his hand and feel no harm (Acts xxviii. 5; cf. Job v. 22, 23; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; Hos. ii. 18). And a true sense of this, as an ultimate prerogative destined for redeemed man, appears, though often in extreme caricature, in the innumerable legends of saints, to whose word and will the wildest creatures are obedient, who summon the fishes to their preaching, who cross rivers on the backs of crocodiles, and accomplish a thousand other feats of a like kind. Nor can we say that this dominion has wholly departed even from man in his natural estate; the fragments of his sceptre still remain in his hands; 'Every kind of beasts is tamed, and hath been tamed, of mankind' (Jam. iii. 7; cf. Sophocles, Antigone, 343-351, a lyrical echo from heathendom of the same truth); but this sceptre which he only wields with difficulty, and with frequent uprisings of his rebellious vassals against him, Christ, as was manifest during these forty days, wielded with an absolute authority. So much we may read in those words, 'He was with the wild beasts.'

¹ Giles Fletcher, in his too much neglected poem, Christ's Triumph on Earth (ver. 1-40), has seized the meaning of these words better than any that I know.

² Thilo, Codex Apocryphus, p. 394.

To that wilderness He, 'the glorious Eremite' was led, 'to be tempted of the devil.' Very remarkable is the prominence which Satan assumes in the New Testament, compared with the manner in which he and the whole doctrine concerning him are kept in the background in the Old. There, after the first appearance of the adversary in Paradise, which even itself is a veiled appearance, he is withdrawn for a long while altogether from the scene; nay, there is but a glimpse of him, a passing indication here and there of such a spiritual head of the kingdom of evil, through the whole earlier economy—as in the first and second chapters of Job, Zech. iii. 1, 2, and 1 Chron. xxi. 1; he is only referred to twice in the Apocrypha (Wisd. ii. 24; Ecclus. xxi. 27). This may partly be explained by an analogy drawn from things natural, namely that where the lights are brightest, the shadows also are darkest. Height and depth are correlatives of one another. It is right which first reveals wrong; and hate only can be read as hate in the light of love; and unholiness in the light of purity. But this does not explain the reticence of Scripture altogether. No

- doubt in that childhood of the human race men were not yet ripe for this knowledge. For as many as took it in earnest, and as it deserves to be taken, for them it would have been too dreadful thus to know of a prince of the powers of darkness, until they had known first of a Prince of Light. Those, therefore, whom God is educating are not allowed to understand anything very distinctly of Satan, till with the spiritual eye it is given to them to behold him as lightning fall from heaven; then indeed, but not till then, the Scripture speaks of him plainly and without reserve. We may perhaps take a hint from this in the teaching of children. The order which was observed of God in the teaching of our race, the reticence, almost entire, but not perfectly so, which was observed in the childhood of our race, may be profitably observed also with children; as also with those whose faculties are as yet spiritually undeveloped. 'I write unto you little children,' says the apostle St. John, 'because ye have known the Father' (1 John ii. 13); this was what they had learned from him, even a heavenly Father's love; but he proceeds: 'I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one' (ver. 14). To them, to the strong, it was given to know that they wrestled not against flesh and blood, but against spiritual wickedness in heavenly places (Ephes. vi. 12).

‘And when He had fasted forty days He was afterward an hungred.’ How are we intended to understand a fast of this length, manifestly impossible to man under ordinary conditions? Not by bringing in, as some have done, Christ’s divine power as the explanation of all; which would indeed rob this fact of its significance for us. We must seek the explanation elsewhere. We are far too much accustomed, in a stiff dualism, to conceive of the spiritual and material as of two worlds altogether apart, with a rigid line of demarcation between them, so that the powers and influences of the higher cannot pass over effectually to operate in the sphere of the lower. Yet all the experience of our daily life contradicts this, and we note the higher continually making itself felt in the region of the lower. The wayworn regiment, which could scarcely drag itself along, but which revives at the well-known air, and forgets all its weariness, what does it but declare that the spirit is lord not merely in its own domain, but is meant to be, and even now in no inconsiderable degree is, the lord of the provinces of man’s life that lie beneath it? Matter, instead of offering a stubborn resistance to spirit, proves in many and marvellous ways to be plastic to it. Sensuality debases and degrades the countenance; purity and love ennoble it, casting a beam even upon the outward shape. What is the resurrection of the body, or the ultimate glorification of nature, or the larger number of those miracles wrought by the Lord in the days of his flesh, but the workings of spirit upon matter? So too it fared with his forty days' fast. To bring in here his divine power, or to suppose that He then fasted otherwise than as a man, is, as has been urged already, to rob the whole transaction of its meaning. Upborne and upholden above the common needs of the animal life by the great tides of spiritual gladness, in the strength of that recent Baptism, in the solemn joy of that salutation and recognition from his Father, He found and felt no need for all these forty days. As a slighter incident of the same kind He forgets hunger and thirst, or rather feels them no more, by the well of Samaria, in the joy of winning a lost soul (John iv. 31-34). In the lives of other men there are quite enough of analogies, which, however removed from this, do yet witness in their lower measure for this same predominance of the spirit, for the dominion which it is able to exercise over the workings of the natural life. All intenser passions, a mighty joy, an overwhelming sorrow, an ecstatic devotion, all these have continually been found to bring a temporary release with them from the necessities of the animal life, and though not for so long a time, still to suspend its claims for a season. Thus Paul at the crisis of his conversion was three days without eating or drinking (Acts ix. 9).

For forty days this fast of the Lord's endured. But wherefore for exactly this number, for forty, and neither more nor less? We are the more tempted to ask this question from the frequent recurrence of this same number under circumstances not altogether dissimilar. Of precisely this same length were the fasts of Moses (Deut. ix. 9) and Elijah (1 Kin. xix. 8); He the Head of the New Covenant in nothing coming short of those who stood as the Chiefs and Representatives of the Old, of the Law, and of the Prophets (Matt. xvii. 3). And yet his fast of forty days is not determined by theirs; but rather theirs and his are alike determined by the significance which this number, forty, in Holy Scripture everywhere obtains. On a close examination we note it to be everywhere there the number or signature of penalty, of affliction, of the confession, or the punishment, of sin.¹ Thus it is the signature of the punishment of sin in the forty days and forty nights during which God announces that He will cause the waters of the deluge to prevail (Gen. vii. 4, 12);² in the forty years of the Israelites' wanderings in the desert (Num. xiv. 33; xxxii. 13, 14; Ps. xcv. 10); in the forty stripes with which the offender should be beaten (Deut. xxv. 3; 2 Cor. xi. 24); in the desolation of Egypt which should endure forty years (Ezek. xxix. 11). So also is it the signature of the confession of sin; Moses intercedes forty days for his people (Deut. ix. 25); the Ninevites proclaim a fast of forty days (Jon. iii. 4); Ezekiel must bear for forty days the transgression of

¹ Jerome (In Amos. ii. 10): Ipse Dominus fecit nos exire de seculo, et per annos quadraginta, qui numerus semper afflictionis et jejunii, luctus est et doloris, per tribulationes et angustias pervenire in terram sanctam. And again (In Jon. iii. 4): Porro quadragenarius numerus convenit peccatoribus, et jejuniis et orationi, et sacco et lacrimis et perseverantiæ deprecandi: ob quod et Moyses quadraginta diebus jejunavit in monte Sina; et Elias fugiens Jezabel, indictâ fame terræ Israël, et Dei desuper irâ pendente, quadraginta dies jejunasse describitur. Ipse quoque Dominus, verus Jona missus ad prædicationem mundi, jejunavit quadraginta dies. Cf. In Ezek. xxix. 11. Thus too Origen (In Deut. xxv. 3): Semper observavimus numerum quadraginta malis obnoxium esse. Unde Moses quadraginta diebus jejunavit, et post eum Elias. Quin et Salvator noster a diabolo tentatus non manducavit quadraginta diebus et quadraginta noctibus; et magnum diluvium in terrâ contigit, cum Deus imbrem fecisset quadraginta diebus et quadraginta noctibus. Compare Augustine, Quæst. in Gen. qu. 169; Serm. 125, § 9; De Cons. Evang. ii. §§ 8, 9. In both these latter places he attempts, not very successfully as it seems to me, to give the rationale of forty as this number of penitence.

² Ambrose, De Noë et Arod. xiii. § 44.

Judah (Ezek. iv. 6); forty days, or twice forty in the case of a maid child, are the period of a woman's purifying after child-birth (Lev. xii. 2-5; cf. Ps. li. 5: 'in sin hath my mother conceived me'). And in agreement with all this, resting on the forty days' fast of her Lord, is the Quadragesimal Lent fast of the Church; with the selection of this Scripture of the Temptation to supply the Gospel for the first Sunday in that season, as being the Scripture which, duly laid to heart, will more than any other help us rightly to observe that time.¹

On one of these forties Tertullian dwells with peculiar emphasis; often bringing out the relation between the forty days of our Lord's Temptation and the forty years of Israel's trial in the wilderness. His fast as the true Israel, as the fulfiller of all which Israel after the flesh had left unfulfilled, the victor in all where it had been the vanquished, was as much a witness against their carnal appetites (for it was in the indulgence of these that they sinned continually, Exod. xv. 23, 24; xvi. 2, 3; xvii. 2, 3; Num. xi. 4, 33)² as a witness against Adam's.³ It was by this abstinence of his declared that man was ordained to be, and that the true man would be, lord over his lower nature. In this way Christ's forty days' fast is the great counter-fact in the work of redemption, at once to Adam's and to Israel's compliances with the suggestions of the fleshly appetite ; exactly in the same manner as the unity of tongues at Pentecost is the counter-fact to the confusion of tongues at Babel (Gen. xi. 7, 8 ; Acts ii. 6-11), to which the Church would draw our attention in the selection of the latter as one of our Whitsuntide lessons.

¹ Augustine, Serm. 210.

² De Bapt. 20: Dominus quantum existimo, de figurâ Israëlitis exprobrationem in ipsum retorsit. Namque populus mare transgressus, in solitudine translatus per quadraginta annos, illic cum divinis copiis aleretur, nihilominus ventris et gulæ meminerat, quam Dei. Deinde Dominus post aquam segregatus in deserto, quadraginta dierum jejunia cemens, ostendit non pane vivere hominem Dei, sed Dei verbo; tentationesque plenitudini et immoderantiae ventris adpositas, abstinentiâ elidi.

³ De Jejun. 6: Immo novum hominem in veteris sugillationem virtute fastidiendi cibum initiabat, ut eum, diabolo rursus per escam tentare quærenti, fortiores fame totâ ostentaret; and again, c. 5: Nam et primus populus primi hominis resculpserat crimen.

For forty days that arrest of the sense of bodily need had continued ; but at the expiration of these the need, suspended so long, made itself felt in its strength ; 'He was afterward an hungred.' The Tempter sees, and thinks to use his opportunity ; and the Temptation proper, dividing itself into three successive acts, begins. But before we enter upon these, a few words may fitly find place on more than one subject of the deepest practical interest.

And first, the assertion of the existence of a Tempter at all, of a personal Wicked One, of the devil, this, as is well known, is a stumblingblock to many. Not urging here the extent to which the veracity of Christ Himself is pledged to the fact, I will content myself with observing that it is not by Scriptural arguments alone that it is supported. There is a dark mysterious element in man's life and history, which nothing else can explain. We can only too easily understand the too strong attractions of the objects of sense on a being who is sensuous as well as spiritual ; the allowing of that lower nature, which should have been the ruled, to reverse the true relation, and to become the ruler. We can understand only too easily man's yielding, even his losing, of himself in this region of sense. But there is a mystery far more terrible than this, a phenomenon unintelligible except upon one assumption.

Those to whom the doctrine of an Evil Spirit is peculiarly unwelcome have been at infinite pains to exorcise theology; and from that domain at least to cast Satan out, even though they should be impotent to cast him out from any other. All who shrink from looking down into 'the abysmal depths of man's fall, because they have no eye for the heavenly heights of his restoration, seem to count that much will have been gained thereby; although it may be very pertinently asked, as indeed one has asked, What is the profit of getting rid of the devil, so long as the devilish remains? of explaining away an Evil One, so long as the evil ones who remain are so many?'¹ What profit indeed? Assuredly this doctrine of an Evil Spirit, tempting, seducing, deceiving, prompting to rebellion and revolt, so far from casting a deeper gloom on the destinies of humanity, is full of consolation, and lights up with a gleam and glimpse of hope spots which seem utterly dark without it. One might well despair of oneself, having no choice but to believe that all the strange suggestions of evil which have risen up before one's own heart had been born there; one might well despair of one's kind, having no choice but to believe that all its hideous sins and all its monstrous crimes had been self-conceived and bred within its own bosom. But there is hope, if 'an enemy have done this;' if, however the soil in which these wicked thoughts and wicked works have sprung up has been the heart of man, yet the seed from which they sprung had been there sown by the hand of another.

And who will venture to deny the existence of this

¹ Goethe, in the spirit of finest irony, puts these words into the mouth of Mephistopheles:

'Den Bösen sind sie los, die bösen sind geblieben.'

devilish, as distinguished from the animal, in man? None certainly, who knows aught of the dread possibilities of sin lurking in his own bosom, who has studied with any true insight the moral history of the world. In what way else explain that men not merely depart from God, but that they defy Him; that, instead of the ungodly merely forgetting God and letting Him go, His name is as often or oftener on their lips than on those of them that love and serve Him? How else explain the casting of fierce words against Him, the actual and active hatred of God which it is impossible not to recognize in some wicked men? What else will account for delight in the contemplation or in the infliction of pain, for strange inventions of wickedness, above all, of cruelty and lust—‘lust hard by hate’? What else for evil chosen for its own sake, and for that fierce joy which men so often find in the violation of law, this violation being itself the attraction; with all those other wicked joys, ‘mala gaudia mentis,’ as the poet in a single phrase has characterized them so well?

The mystery is as inexplicable as it is dreadful so long as man will know nothing of a spiritual world beneath him, as well as one above him; but it is only too easy to understand, so soon as we recognize man’s evil as not altogether his own, but detect behind his transgression an earlier transgression and an earlier transgressor—one who fell, not as man fell, for man’s fall was mercifully broken by that very flesh which invited it; but who fell as only Spirits can fall, from the height of heaven to the depth of hell; fell never to rise again; for he was not deceived, was not tempted, as was Adam; but himself chose the evil with the clearest intuition that it was the evil, forsook the good with the clearest intuition that it was the good; whose sin therefore in its essence was the sin against the Holy Ghost, and as such, not to be forgiven in this world nor in the world to come. All is explicable when we recognize the existence of such a Spirit; who, being lost without hope of redemption himself, seeks to work the same loss in other of God's creatures, and counts it a small triumph to have made man bestial, unless he can make him devilish as well. Such a personal Tempter innumerable moral and spiritual phenomena of this fallen world at once demand and attest; and such a Tempter or devil existing, it lay in the necessity of things that he should come into direct and immediate collision with Him who had one mission in the world, and that, to destroy the works of the devil.

But freely admitting the existence of such a Tempter, the Temptation of Christ, that He should have been tempted at all, or having been tempted, that such immeasurable worth should be attached to his victory over temptation, this has a difficulty of its own, which has more or less clearly presented itself to many, I suppose to every one who has sought at all to enter into the deeper significance of this mysterious transaction. The difficulty and dilemma may be stated thus: Either there was that in Christ which more or less responded to the temptation—how then was He without sin, seeing that sin moves in the region of desires quite as really as in that of external acts? or there was nothing in Him that responded to the suggestions of the Tempter—where then was the reality of the temptation, or what was the significance of the victory which in the wilderness He won?

The secret of the difficulty which these alternatives

present to our minds, so that sometimes it appears to us impossible that Christ's Temptation should have been real, leaving Him as it did wholly unscathed, lies in the mournful experience which we in our own spiritual life have made, namely, that almost all of our temptations involve more or less of sin, that the serpent leaves something of his trail even there where he is not allowed to nestle and make his home. Conquerors though we may be, yet we seldom issue from the conflict without a scratch,—a hurt it may be which soon heals, but which has left its cicatrice behind it. Very seldom indeed we come forth from these fires, as the Three Children, without even so much as the smell of fire having passed upon us (Dan. iii. 27). The saint, if he shine as a diamond at last, yet it is still as a diamond which has been polished in its own dust. For we may take up arms against the evil thought, we may rally the higher powers of our souls, and call in the might of a Mightier to put the evil and its author to flight, yet this we seldom do till it has already found some place within us.¹ The fiery darts may have been quenched almost as soon as they alighted; they may not therefore have set on fire in us the whole 'course of nature' (Jam. iii. 6); but they should have been warded off and extinguished, before they alighted, by that shield of faith, which the apostle bids us to assume against them (Ephes. vi. 16).² Ours may have been but a moment's acquiescence in the temptation. But thus momentary and seemingly involuntary as it was, and graciously and surely as it will be included in the daily forgiveness, yet even this moment during which the evil was not abhorred and loathed is irreconcilable with the idea of a perfect holiness; for this is as a mirror whose perfect brightness no lightest breath has ever troubled or tarnished for an instant. Of course the reconciliation of an absolute sinlessness in Christ with the reality of the temptations to which He was exposed lies in this, that there was never in Him this momentary delectation; even as there need not be in us; and would not be, if we always were, and had always in time past been, upon our highest guard. It is not of the necessity of a temptation that it should in the least defile. The fact that it does so, is only the sad accident and adjunct of too many of ours, even of those against which sooner or later we take up arms, and by God's grace do not suffer them to embody themselves in sinful acts, or even in sinful desires deliberately entertained. So naturally in the estimate which we form of the matter does sin follow on temptation, that when the apostle had affirmed of Christ that He was 'in all points tempted like as we are,' he counts it needful at once to add, 'yet without sin' (Heb. iv. 15), without the sinful results which in men almost inevitably follow.¹

¹ There is in respect of the sin, to adopt a fine distinction of Peter Lombard and some others of the Schoolmen, the propassio or inception, even where there is not the passio. Few have exercised a keener moral oversight of their own hearts than Thomas à Kempis, and he traces thus the genesis of evil in the heart of man (De Imit. Christ. i. 13. 5): Primo occurrit menti simplex cogitatio; deinde fortis imaginatio; postea delectatio et motus pravus et assensio. Itaque paulatim ingreditur hostis malignus ex toto, dum illi non resistitur in principio.

² See Origen, De Princ. iii. 2. 4.

It is quite true that even from these temptations themselves we may derive good; that they, even with issues

¹ Bengel has some good words here on the promptness of our Lord's resistance to each proffered temptation: Quomodo autem sine peccato tentatus, compati potest tentatis cum peccato? In intellectu, multo acrius anima Salvatoris percepit imagines tentantes, quam nos infirmi; in voluntate tam celeriter incursum earum retudit, quam ignis aquæ guttulam sibi objectam.

sorrowful for the time as these, may yet be to us sources of ultimate strength; that thus it may prove with us as with the oyster, which stops with a precious pearl the hole in its shell which was originally a disease; as with the broken limb, which, having been set, may be stronger than if it never had been broken. It may fare with us as islanders of the Southern Ocean fancy that it fares with them; counting, as they do, that the strength and valour of the warrior whom they have slain in battle passes into themselves, as their rightful inheritance; for so it proves indeed with the Christian man and the temptations which he conquers and slays; and this, even though the victory may have been won not without hurts to himself, gotten in the conflict. The strength which lay in the temptation has shifted its seat, and passed over into the man who has overcome the temptation.¹ The great Church writers of all times, all to whom any largeness of utterance has been granted, who have bravely looked man's true condition in the face, have not feared to speak bold words on this matter; words indeed, like all other words on the subject of grace, capable of being wrested and abused by the licentious and falsehearted, of being therefore held up by the timid as antinomian provocations ; but words which for all this ought not the less to be spoken. Such Augustine abounds in, as often as he treats of St. Paul's thorn in the flesh, or of St. Peter's fall ; yet always keeping within just limits ; which limits another overpasses when, treating of the last and of all the spiritual gains which in the end the apostle obtained through it, he exclaims, O felix culpa! A fault or sin is never 'happy,' is always unhappy ; it is ever 'infelix culpa,' whatever good by the grace of God and by that wondrous alchemy of heaven which draws gold from dross, may be educes from it ; and those who employ any other language or think any other thought about sin, are perilously near, however little they may guess it, to them whom the apostle Paul has denounced (Rom. iii. 5-8).

¹ Our theologians of the seventeenth century were fond of illustrating this truth by aid of the legend that the viper's flesh (θηριακή, from θηρίον, see Acts xxviii. 5), 'theriac,' 'triacle,' and last of all 'treacle,' was the most potent antidote for the viper's bite. Thus Jeremy Taylor: 'There is a ὑπερνικώμεν in St. Paul. We are more than conquerors. Non solum viperam terimus, sed ex eâ antidotum conficimus. We kill the viper and make treacle of him; i. e. not only escape from, but get advantage from temptations.' And Hales: 'Wonderful, therefore, is the power of a Christian; who not only overcomes and conquers and kills the viper, but, like the skilful apothecary, makes antidote and treacle of him.' So too Gurnall: 'The saints' experiences help them to a sovereign treacle made of the scorpion's own flesh (which they through Christ have slain), and that hath a virtue above all others to expel the venom of Satan's temptations from the heart.'

But this, the absolute rejection and repudiation of every suggestion in any way contrary to the perfect will of God, a repudiation in every case reaching to the earliest moment of its presentation to Him whereunto it is possible in imagination to travel back, this is not all. There is another point of difference between Christ's temptations and ours ; namely, that all our Lord's temptations were addressed to Him from without, were distinct suggestions of the Evil Spirit.¹ Those who, in their anxiety to do away with an external Tempter, or from any other motive, resolve the Temptation into an internal conflict with thoughts of self-indulgence, vain-glory, ambition, disturb, whether they are aware of it or no, that image of a perfect holiness which is essential to the character and office of a Redeemer; who only as He was Himself without sin could save others from their sins; but who would not, if this were admitted, have been without it. We cannot conceive of the temptation of the first Adam reaching him except from without. That he should have been his own tempter is irreconcilable even with the more negative holiness which we ascribe to him. It would have been infinitely more inconsistent with the more positive holiness of the second Adam.¹ One of Schleiermacher's most gifted pupils, who finished his brief career while as yet it was uncertain in what camp he would ultimately be found,²

¹ Gregory the Great (Moral. xxiv. 11): Hostis noster quanto magis nos sibi rebellare conspiciat, tanto amplius expugnare contendit. Eos enim pulsare negligit, quos quieto jure possidere se sentit. Hoc enim in seipso Dominus sub quâdam dispensatione figuravit, qui diabolum non nisi post baptismum se tentare permisit, ut signum nobis quoddam futuræ conversionis innueret, quod membra ejus postquam ad Deum proficerent, tunc acriores tentationum insidias tolerarent.

¹ Gregory the Great (Hom. 16 in Evang.): Sciendum nobis est, quia tribus modis tentatio agitur, suggestione, delectatione, et consensu. Et nos cum tentamur plerumque in delectationem, aut etiam in consensum labimur, quia de carnis peccato propagati, in nobis ipsis etiam gerimus unde certamina toleremus. Deus vero, qui in utero Virginis incarnatus, in mundum sine peccato venerat, nihil contradictionis in semetipso tolerabat. Tentari ergo per suggestionem potuit, sed ejus mentem peccati delectatio non momordit. Atque ideo omnis diabolica illa tentatio foris non intus fuit. Compare F. Spanheim (Dub. Evang. li.): Distinguendum inter tentationem admotam et admissam, inter suggestionem mali externam et internam, inter suggestionem insinuatam et receptam. Tentatio illa ratione tentatoris mala erat, non ratione tentati, admota quippe Christo duntaxat, non admissa, externa non interna, insinuata tantum non recepta. Camero (Myrothec. Evang. on Heb. iv. 13, p. 315) has a lively illustration: Tentatus fuit igitur Christus in omnibus, et quidem quod ad sensum doloris attinet, eadem ratione quæ nos; sine peccato tamen, quod nobis non contingit. Nam (utamur enim hoc exemplo) quantumvis aquam puram et limpidam exagites, non fit turbida; sed si aquam puram quidem, ut videtur, sed in cujus imâ parte cœnum est vel limus, agitaveris, continuo quæ visa est pura aqua, videtur lutulenta aut certe turbidula.

² Usteri. He has two articles on the Temptation in the Theol. Stud. und Krit. 1829, p. 449; 1832, p. 768; from the former of which my citation is taken. Nothing can be more masterly than the manner in which he deals not with this only, but with all the attempts to explain away the Temptation, which at different times have been proposed; showing the inner contradictions which they involve; though, having effectually done this, he cannot be content without adding another attempt of his own.

has on this point some admirable remarks : ‘ It is not difficult to draw a very attractive picture of the inner temptation of Jesus, such as shall not be unlike the Choice of Hercules, standing, as Prodicus has described him, at the point where the two ways separated before him. One may find it also comforting and elevating that Christ was in all points tempted like as are we. Only how stands it then with what follows, “yet without sin,” if we examine that statement psychologically and dogmatically ? For first of all it must be remembered that if such an inner struggle and conflict of thoughts existed in the mind of Jesus, and if He remained for an instant undecided and doubtful in regard of them, then both trains of thought must be regarded as his own, and the possibility of a decision upon one side as well as upon the other be admitted. Hereby Jesus will be coordinated with all other men, in whom the conflict of the good with the evil finds place ; and we must conceive of this conflict not merely in the beginning of his public career ; but where once a struggle has found place, it can revive again, needs nothing more than the suitable conditions to reproduce it ; and only through patience and perseverance can a skill in the vanquishing of temptation be attained. This psychological consequence excludes the hypothesis of such an inward struggle as was limited to one certain moment of time ; and there would be nothing else but to say, “ Jesus had within Him besides the good also an evil principle, against which He needed to be ever on his guard, though it is only in the history of the Temptation that this struggle is symbolically attached to a definite moment in his life.” But were Jesus constituted so, then were He not the Christ, but a man as others are, submitted to the same conditions, with a flesh and spirit contrary to one another; consequently not a Redeemer, but Himself needing a redemption; and not only the words in St. John on his oneness with the Father, but those in the other Gospels on his dignity as Messiah, are either not authentic; or, if He actually spoke them, He either deluded Himself or deceived mankind.¹

In the scholastic theology of the Middle Ages the dis-

¹ H. de S. Victore, the Augustine of the Middle Ages, has an interesting passage on this matter (De Sacram. 11, pars 1, c. 7): Sunt alii qui de affectibus humanis in Christo (quos secundum veritatem naturæ cum humanitate et in humanitate suscepit) quædam non solum falsa sed horrenda etiam affirmare non timuerunt. Quia enim apostolus ait, Non habemus Pontificem qui non possit compati infirmitatibus nostris, tentatum autem per omnia: asserunt humanum affectum in Christo motus etiam vitiorum sensisse, absque consensu tamen rationis: secundum eam concupiscendi rationem quâ nos qui peccatores sumus ex illâ originali corruptione quam portamus illicitos appetitus, et motus concupiscentiæ surgentis et vitii tentantis delectationem etiam inviti sentire solemus. Hos autem motus idcirco Christum in carne suâ voluntarie sustinuisse, ut quasi illis tentantibus resistendo victor existeret, quatenus et sibi tentationem vitiorum superando præmium justitiæ acquireret, et nobis in tentatione positis resistendi et vincendi in semetipso exemplum formaret. Sed absit a sensu Christiano ut ullam in illâ carne sacrosanctâ Agni immaculati inordinatæ delectationis et concupiscentiæ illicitæ titillationem aliquo modo fuisse, aut dicat, aut credat; qui si vel aliquam pravæ delectationis radicem aut motum concupiscendi inordinatum in illâ fuisse dicereimus, profecto ab omni vitio liberam negaremus. Quomodo autem vitium mundaret, si vitium portaret? motus quippe inordinatus ex infirmitate concupiscendi surgens cum ipsâ tantam corruptione de quâ oritur, non solum pœna est, sed culpa: quæ tamen in baptizatis ad damnationem non imputatur, quia per gratiam novæ regenerationis excusatur. Hæc tamen corruptio per gratiam Sacramenti non quidem accipit ut culpa non sit, sed ut damnabilis non sit.... Quapropter illam infirmitatem humanæ naturæ quæ pœna est, solum cum susceptione carnis Christum assumpsisse veraciter dicimus: illam vero, quæ sic pœna est ut etiam culpa sit, nullatenus admisisse indubitanter affirmamus. Neque enim sic victorem vitiorum dicere volumus, ut eum ipsa quæ vinceret vitia portâsse aliquando ac sensisse dicamus. Propterea enim per solam pœnam infirmari consensit, ut eos qui et in culpâ et in pœnâ ægrotabant, primum a culpâ justificaret, postea a pœnâ liberaret. Compare the careful words of Augustine himself (Op. Imperf. con. Jul. iv. 48): Non dicimus nos Christum, felicitate carnis a nostris sensibus sequestratæ, cupiditatem vitiorum sentire non potuisse; sed dicimus, eum perfectione virtutis, et non per carnis concupiscentiam procreatâ carne, cupiditatem non habuisse vitiorum.

cussion was carried on with considerable animation whether a possibility of not sinning (a posse non peccare) or an impossibility of sinning (a non posse peccare) should be ascribed to the Lord. The first had been, in the patristic period, the position of Theodore of Mopsuestia and of as many as, without being actually Nestorians, had yet theological tendencies which inclined them to advance as far as might be in that direction; while the second had been maintained by Augustine. It was with this, as with so many of the earlier discussions, which were resumed and carried out yet further in the period of the medieval revival of theology; Abelard, as was naturally to be expected, taking up the position of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Anselm and others upholding the Augustinian teaching.¹ This question could never have been so much as started, except in a Nestorian severance of the Lord into two persons, and thus in the contemplation of a human person in Him as at some moment existent apart from the divine. When we ascribe to Him two natures, but these at no time other than united in the one person of the Son of God, the whole question at once falls to the ground. And such is the Church's faith. Christ was perfect man in the sense of having every thing belonging to the completeness of the human nature; but the person is the Son of God; his human body and soul at the very moment of their union with one another were also united with the Eternal Word, so that there is not, nor ever has been, any human person to contemplate, or in regard of whom to put this question; while in respect of the Christ, and in the manhood after it was taken up into the God-

¹ Neander, Kirch. Gesch. vol. v. p. 968.

head, even Abelard himself does not ascribe to Him the possibility of sinning.¹

When it is asked, as it continually has been, Where is the worth of an obedience which could not have not been rendered? where is the glory of not sinning on the part of One who could not sin? the question has its rise in the confusion of a moral and a physical necessity. God cannot lie, God cannot do evil; but shall we therefore cease to praise and glorify Him for his holiness and truth? He cannot, because He will not. The angels now cannot sin; they have so drunk in the glory of God, that, as we believe, they are lifted above the possibility of falling. But does it therefore follow that their obedience, then when they might have followed those 'who kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation' (Jude 6), had a worth; which now that they cannot, it has ceased to possess? There is something better and higher, as Augustine and Anselm have taught, than the liberum arbitrium, even though that should on each separate occasion of choice choose the good; and that better is the libertas, the beata necessitas boni; which so soon as the creature has attained, it would certainly be strange to affirm of it that this highest has reduced it to the state of the lowest, to the condition of stocks and stones, which indeed cannot do wrong, but for the same causes that hinder them from this, can as little do right.²

When two antagonists enter the lists, our moral certainty

¹ Ad Rom. p. 539: Cum hominem qui Deo unitus est, possibile sit peccare, non tamen postquam unitus est vel dum unitus est. Christum vero, i. e. Deum simul et hominem modis omnibus impossibile est peccare; cum videlicet ipsum Christi nomen Dei et hominis exprimat unionem.

² See on this matter a very interesting discussion by Anselm, Cur Deus Homo? ii. 10.

that one will overcome, may take away the breathless expectation and interest with which we might otherwise mark the several stages of the conflict, but cannot affect the real excellence and merit of the victor.

But all this, namely that the temptations were thus presented from without and not born from within, and, again, that they found not even a moment's acquiescence, consent and entertainment in that holy soul, does not hinder in the least that what was offered may have presented itself as infinitely desirable. In the reality of the temptations we are bound to believe, nor will it be very hard to understand, in part at least, where that reality consisted when we a little consider them one by one, which now it is time to do. To these considerations some words of Professor Mill on this very matter may prove a fitting introduction. 'If,' he says, 'the highest virtue does not exclude that instinct inseparable from humanity, to which pain is an object of dread and pleasure of desire; which prefers ease and quiet to tumult and vexation, the regard and esteem of others to their scorn and aversion; to which ill-requited toil or experienced unkindness are sources of corroding anguish and depression;—this very conjuncture which presents but one of these objects of dread as the concomitant of doing God's will, or associates one of their desirable opposites with neglect or disobedience—every conjuncture must produce a conflict between duty and these necessary instincts of humanity, sufficient to constitute temptation in the strictest sense.'¹

'And when the Tempter came unto Him, he said, If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.' A certain external likeness which might exist between stones and bread (cf. Matt. vii. 9) explains why on those more than on anything else Christ should have been challenged to display his power. It has been often asked, Putting his suggestion thus, did the Tempter indeed know Him whom he assailed to be the Son of God? or was the suggestion merely tentative, to make Him reveal Himself, and show by his reply what manner of person, and clothed with what power, He was? The question has been variously answered. The ancients probably are right, who for the most part reply, that the Evil Spirit was thus taking the measure of Him whom by a true instinct he recognized for his mortal foe;¹ fearing the worst; but at the same time still uncertain with whom he had to do. The first words which he utters, 'If Thou be the Son of God,' Christ was destined to hear again in the hour of a keener suffering even than this. He should be again taunted and provoked, and in exactly the same language (Matt. xxvii. 40), to prove his Messiahship, and in this very act of proving to render void the whole work which as Messiah He came to accomplish; but then as now He is able to leave the vindication of his Sonship in his Father's hands.

¹ Five Sermons on the Temptation, 1844, p. 37.

That to which Satan here challenges the Lord, to 'command that these stones be made bread,' was not sinful in itself, but would have been sinful for Him. To have complied, would have been a defeat of his whole mediatorial work. If on each sharper pressure of the world's suffering and pain upon Himself, He had fallen back on the power which as

¹ So Hilary: Erat in diabolo de metu suspicio, non de suspicione cognitio. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xi. 21): Dubitavit de illo demonum princeps, eumque tentavit, an Christus esset explorans, quantum se tentari ipse permisit, ut hominem quem gerebat ad nostræ imitationis temperaret exemplum.

Son of God He possessed, and so exempted Himself from the common lot of humanity, where would have been the fellow-man, the overcomer of the world by his human faith, and not by his divine power?¹ The whole life of faith would have disappeared. At his Incarnation the Lord had merged his lot with the lot of the race; the temptation is, that He should separate Himself from them anew: 'Son of God, put forth thy power.' When in some besieged and famine-stricken city, when in hard straits during the march through some waterless desert, a captain or commander refuses special exemptions from the lot of his suffering fellow-soldiers, when a Cato pours upon the sands the single draught of water which has been procured in the African desert and brought for his drinking,² such a one in his lower sphere acts out what the Lord in the highest sphere of all acted now. His miracles shall be all for the needs of others, never for his own.³ He who made the water wine, could have made

¹ Aquinas: Diabolus iustitiâ Dei, non potentiâ, superandus fuit. Compare Augustine, De Trin. xiii. 14.

² Lucan, Pharsal. ix. 510:

Excussit galeam, suffecitque omnibus unda.

Compare Plutarch, Alex. 42.

³ All this I ventured long ago to embody in a brief poem:

'He might have reared a palace at a word,
Who sometimes had not where to lay his head;
Time was, and He who nourished crowds with bread,
Would not one meal unto Himself afford.
Twelve legions girded with angelic sword
Were at his beck, the scorned and buffeted;
He healed another's scratch; his own side bled,
Side, feet, and hands, with cruel piercings gored.
Oh wonderful the wonders left undone!
And scarce less wonderful than those He wrought;
Oh self-restraint, passing all human thought,
To have all power, and be as having none!
Oh self-denying love, which felt alone
For needs of others, never for its own!'

the stones bread ; but to that He was solicited by the need of others, to this only by his own. And this abstinence of self-help was the law of his whole life, a life as wonderful in the miracles which it left undone as in those which it wrought.

The stress of this, as of each other of the subsequent temptations, consisted in the fact that what Satan proposed did lie in the final purposes of the ministry of the Son of God ; and that it was only in its premature anticipations that the sin consisted. Thus it did lie in final issues of his ministry for man that the desert should blossom as a rose (Isai. xxxv. 1 ; lxv. 25), that all straitness, hunger, poverty, want, all sweat of the brow, hardly wringing from the soil the pittance of the day, and leaving little or no opportunity for higher mental or moral culture, that all these consequences of the primeval curse upon the earth (Gen. iii. 17, 18) should cease and come to an end—that, so to speak, the stones should become bread. But the temptation was, to begin instead of ending with this, to bring about an outer world of abundance otherwise than as the expression and the result of an inner kingdom of righteousness. And in the Lord's refusal to do this is involved the condemnation of every plan for redressing the hard lot of humanity which does not begin from the root, which thinks to make men happier without making them holier, all communist schemes, all the profane millenarianism of an Owen or a Fourier. It is no heavenly root, but quite another, out of which these grow. They are not of good, and cannot come to good. Yet who will dare measure the strength of this temptation, as it may have presented itself to Him who beheld with a compassion at once human and divine the infinite toil and want of the children of men; for I believe we mistake altogether when we find in his own immediate hunger that which gave the whole, or even the chief, stress and force to this temptation. Standing as He did at the centre of humanity, and commanding all the diverging lines to their extreme circumference, that hunger was to Him but as the key and interpreter to all the hunger, all the need, all the distress which the children of Adam had ever felt, or should ever feel, until the great and glorious day when the primeval curse should be lightened from off the earth, and it should again yield its foison with the free bounty of Paradise. His own hunger was included; but this did not exclude, rather took in that of every one besides. And to be able to stay all this, to speak the word and bring it all to an end, who, with a sinful and therefore a selfish heart, is at all in a position to estimate what this temptation was to the great Lover of the bodies and the souls of men? But now for the answer.

The Tempter had said, 'If Thou be the Son of God:' Christ does not reply, 'I am;' nor find here, as He easily might, a reason for not complying with the challenge; since answering so, He would indeed have overcome the adversary, but He would have overcome him only for Himself, and not also for us. No other, being only a man, and not in that peculiar sense 'the Son of God,' could have silenced him in the same way. The answer would have stood apart, and would have fitted no other lips but his own.¹ But the answer which He gives is one which every other may employ as freely as He did: 'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' He throws his broad shield not merely over Himself, but over all those whom He has called his brethren, and with whom in his Incarnation He has made common part and lot; and saying, 'Man shall not live' He declares that He will not separate Himself from his race. These words are drawn, as indeed are both the other passages which He cites, not merely from the Old Testament, but from the history of Israel's forty years' temptation in the wilderness, and from that as it is resumed in the Book of Deuteronomy. And this certainly is not for nothing, nor without its significance; but finds its explanation in the fact that Israel was the figure of the Son of man, was 'the servant of God,' that should have fulfilled all righteousness, but did not; in which fact we must seek the justification of St. Matthew's use of Hosea's words, 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son' (Matt ii. 13; cf. Hos. xi. 1). Christ, as there has been already occasion to urge, is not merely the second Adam, but the true Israel, and the true servant of God (Isai. xlii. 1), who as such should testify by his obedience that man truly lives only in and by the everlasting word.

¹ Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. v. 20): Non enim quasi Deus utitur potestate (quid enim mihi proderat?) sed quasi homo, commune sibi arcessit auxilium. Of. Augustine, Enarr. 2^a in Ps. cx. 10, 11.

The words were originally spoken by Moses in reference to the manna: 'He fed thee with manna which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only; but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live' (Deut. viii. 3). But this being so, what, it may be asked, was their special appropriateness at a moment like the present? They had this fitness. In the giving of the manna, and in the feeding of the people thereby, lay a signal proof that God was not limited to ordinary means; but, as then He created 'a new thing' with which to sustain his people, so now He could feed one who trusted in Him, altogether without any external helps and appliances whatever. God is Himself the nourisher, and not the bread or anything else. The manna was but the help to a weak faith; for that did not really nourish any, but only God's might which worked in and through the manna. And thus the Lord does not mean by this quotation that man wants something besides bread, has a soul which must be sustained by heavenly food, as his body is by earthly; and that if that be fed, it imports little how this may fare. His words are still more to the point. The creative word, the ῥῆμα Θεοῦ, which alone imparts to the bread its sustaining power, can sustain, even as He is confident that in the present need it will sustain, apart from the bread.¹ The answer is in fact a keener way of saying, 'I have meat to eat that ye know not of (John iv. 31). I am not pressed, as thou suggestest, and as thou wouldst fain have Me to believe; I live upon God.'² 'God,' as Jeremy Taylor has said, applying these words, 'will certainly give us bread, and till He does we can live by the breath of his mouth, by the word of God, by the light of his countenance, by the refreshment of his promises. If the fleshpots be removed He can alter the appetite; and when our stock is spent, He can also lessen the necessity; or if that continues, He can drown the sense of it in a deluge of patience and resignation.¹

¹ Cocceius: Potest Deus vivificare absque pane, et sine verbo Dei ne panis quidem ad vitam est. Spanheim (Dub. Evang. 58): Tentator objiciebat, vel fame ipsi esse pereundum, vel lapides convertendos in panem, alioquin nullum dari medium ipsius conservandi. Immo, inquit Dominus, media innumera alia dari possunt præter panem: quæcumque enim rem placet Deo adhibere ad sustentationem hominis ea sufficere potest, vel verbum solum promissionis egrediens ex ore Domini.

² It is a beautiful Jewish legend to which Philo (De Somn. i. 6) refers, that Moses during his forty days' fast on Mount Horeb was fed by the melodies of heaven, the music of the spheres—by which he goes on to say, if our ears were now purged to drink them in, we too might equally be sustained. Not unlike this in spirit is the saying quoted by Schoetgen (Hor. Heb. vol. i. p. 87): Justi perfecti ex splendore Schechinæ comedunt.

'Then the devil taketh Him up into the holy city, and setteth Him on a pinnacle of the temple.' Characteristically enough it is St. Matthew who thus calls Jerusalem 'the holy city.' To him, the Jew, it was eminently such (cf. xxvii. 53; Isai. xlviii. 2; lii. 1; Dan. ix. 24; Rev. xi. 2; xxi. 2; Eccl. xxxvi. 13; 1 Macc. x. 31), 'the city of the Great King' (Matt. v. 35). In the parallel record of St. Luke, it is simply 'Jerusalem.' I should be unwilling to interpret this 'taketh' with Hammond, as though it were, 'carried Him through the air;' for such a rapture and flight, a yielding of Himself so far to the will of the adversary, seems inconsistent with the dignity which in the midst of all his humiliation the Son evermore preserved. They who will have it so, observe that it is nothing strange if He who allowed Himself to be buffeted, scourged, crucified by the servants of the devil, should yield Himself thus far to the violence of their master; and that all which concerns us is to keep in mind that it was a violence which could not have been exercised upon Him, unless He had willingly submitted Himself to it.² But certainly the language which St. Matthew uses does not require, hardly justifies, such a meaning as this. The word we have translated 'taketh' (παραλαμβάνει) is the same which all three Evangelists employ when they would describe the Lord's leading up with Him his chosen apostles to the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28; and often elsewhere). That which may have in part induced this interpretation, namely, the supposition that the 'pinnacle¹ of the temple' was some giddy point, unattainable except by such ærial flight, is a mistake. Whatever it may have been, it certainly was not this; for in the history of the martyrdom of James the Just, given by Hegesippus and preserved for us by Eusebius,² the martyr is set on this same 'pinnacle,' which he could only have reached by ordinary means, that from thence he may harangue the people below, and when he disappoints the expectation of the Jews who had set him there, is by them cast headlong down.

¹ Life of Christ, i, 9.

² Deyling: Noli in hac re diaboli potentiam sed potius Servatoris patientiam mirari.

'And saith unto Him, If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down; for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning Thee, and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest at any time Thou dash thy foot against a stone.' The temple was plainly the fitting place for this, the peculiarly theocratic temptation, as the wilderness had been for that addressed to the fleshly appetite, and as the high mountain should be for the temptation yet in store from the world; even as it has been fancifully suggested that the Tempter assumed different shapes in succession, an eremite in the wilderness, an angel of light on this pinnacle of the temple, a king when he offered on the mountain the world-kingdoms to the Lord. Expanding this temptation a little, we may better realize to ourselves wherein consisted its enticing power. What the Tempter suggested may have been very nearly as follows : ‘ Be acknowledged the Christ at once. Give of thy own free accord that which those in whose hands it will lie to accept or reject Thee will so often demand, namely, “ a sign from heaven ” (Matt. xii. 38; xvi. 1; Luke xii. 54, 56). Descend with a pomp of angels upholding and upbearing Thee, in the midst of an admiring people. Thou art appointed to be the Christ. Why take the way of a long and tedious recognition? Why consent to be despised and rejected—bringing all which thus Thou wilt bring of evil on Thyself and on them that reject Thee, when by one noble venture of faith, having moreover a Scripture warrant for this, thou mightest at a single bound leap to that remote consummation which is indeed in the intentions and purposes of God ?’

¹ Πτερόγιον, which the grammarians explain by ἀκρωτήριον, the diminutive of πτερόξ, a wing, pinna or penna in Latin; the latter being the form in which the word, literally employed, assumes; while pinna, with its diminutive pinnaculum, is the winglike lappet of a building. For the different views of what this πτερόγιον of the temple actually was, see Deyling, Obs. Sac., vol. ii. p. 371

² H. E. ii. 23.

With what marvellous skill has the Tempter shifted in an instant the whole line of his assault. In that first temptation he urged the Lord to a distrust of his Father’s love, so that He must help Himself, if He is indeed to be helped at all; but now he urges not indeed to trust that love overmuch, for this is impossible, but to put it to the proof in a way of his own choosing, and not of God’s appointing. If he cannot entangle Him in the sin of diffidentia, perhaps then in that of præfidentia,—if such a word may be allowed. Satan too has learned something else in that first encounter; he has learnt that the Scripture is the law of Christ’s life; the sphere in which He lives and moves. On a word of that Scripture the Lord had grounded his refusal to make the stones bread. Here then is a word of that same Scripture, which should induce Him to consent to that which is now put before Him. 'Makest Thou so much of that word? Hopest Thou on its assurance for such a miracle in thy behalf? Then see in that which I now set before Thee, how Thou mayest show yet more gloriously thy confidence in the favour of God toward Thee.'

That ninety-first Psalm which the adversary quotes, is written not concerning the Son of God in particular, but concerning the faithful generally. Yet for all this it cannot be said that there was any abusing or mis-quoting of it in applying the promise which it contains, as Satan now does, to Christ; since whatever was written concerning the faithful in general, must be eminently true concerning Him who is the Head of the faithful. Origen then,¹ it must be admitted, ~~was~~ is not right here, when he accuses Satan of a fraudulent transfer to Christ of what was written about others, and in this respect of perverting Scripture; an accusation which Chrysostom and Jerome repeat. That there is and must be somewhere a lie in the application even of words of truth on the part of him who is a liar and only a liar is certain. He lies, as St. Bernard has very well shown, leaving out, as he does, one little clause, which would have altered the whole character of the quotation. 'He shall give his angels charge concerning Thee,' this much Satan cites; but the words following 'to keep Thee in all thy ways,' these he omits altogether.² But that to which he now challenged the

¹ Hom. 31. in Luc.

² Mendacium abscondens per Scripturam sicut omnes hæretici, as Irenæus observes (v. 31); and none had greater experience of their devices.

Lord was not 'a way' appointed by his heavenly Father for his treading, and in which as such He might be sure that he would not stumble (John xi. 9, 10), but a precipice from which He would have wantonly chosen to fling Himself down; and the promise of being kept in all his ways no one has a right to take to himself, who has exchanged his appointed ways for any such headlong precipices as that now suggested to the Lord.¹

'Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God;' written, indeed, in almost every page of Scripture, but the special reference is to Deut. vi. 16. But first, in that 'It is written again' of Christ, lies a great lesson, quite independent of that particular Scripture which on this occasion He quotes, or of the use to which He turns it. There lies in it the secret of our safety and defence against all distorted use of isolated passages in Holy Scripture. Only as we enter into the unity of Scripture, as it balances, completes, and explains itself, are we armed against error and delusion, excess or defect on this side or the other. Thus the retort, 'It is written again,' must be of continual application; for, indeed, what very often are heresies but onesided exaggerated truths, truths rent away indeed from the body and complex of the Truth, without the balance of the counter-truth, which should have kept them in their due place, coordinated with other truths or subordinated to them; and so, because all such checks are wanting, not truth any more but error?¹

¹ Bernard (In Ps. Quis Latitat, Sermon 15): Scriptum est, inquit, Quoniam angelis suis mandavit de te, et in manibus tollent te. Quid scriptum est, maligne, quid scriptum est? Angelis suis mandavit de te. Quid mandavit? Animadvertite et videte quoniam subitavit malignus et fraudulentus quod malignitatis suæ commenta dissolveret. Quid enim mandavit? Nempe quod in psalmo sequitur: Ut custodiant te in omnibus viis tuis. Numquid in præcipitiis? Qualis via hæc de pinnaculo templi mittere se deorsum? Non est via hæc, sed ruina; et si via, tua est, non illius. Frustra in tentationem capitis intorsisti, quod scriptum est ad corporis consolationem. Delitzsch: Es ist nicht die Rede von Gefahren, die man aussucht, sondern von solchen, die den Gerechten ungesucht auf den Lebenswegen begegnen.

It is a weapon at once offensive and defensive, a sun at once and a shield, which the Lord on this occasion draws from the armoury of God: 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.' The same apparent difficulty which lies in St. James' declaration that 'God tempteth not any man' (i. 13), when set over against so many other passages in which a tempting of man is ascribed to Him (Gen. xxi. 1; John vi. 6), lies also in St. James' statement made at the same place that 'God cannot be tempted' as compared with so many other, in which men are charged with the sin, or warned against the sin, of tempting God; such as Exod. xvii. 2; Num. xiv. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 18, 56; Acts v. 9; xv. 10; and the present. But here, as there, the contradiction lies only on the surface, and as soon as we descend a little below this, it quite disappears. There is a sense in which men 'tempt' God, as no doubt there is also a sense in which they cannot 'tempt' Him. They 'tempt' God, when they mistrust the resources of his wisdom, his power, his goodness; when they will not believe Him on his simple word, but challenge Him to make present and immediate experiment of these before, they will give Him credit for possessing them. Thus when the children of Israel exclaimed, 'Can God furnish a table in the wilderness?' (Ps. lxxviii. 19) this question of theirs was in the strictest sense of the word a 'tempting' of God ; as the Psalmist expressly declares 'They tempted God in their heart'—'they tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel' (ver. 41). In like manner Ahaz refuses to ask a sign from God, sheltering himself behind the precept of Deut. vi. 16; and pretending to believe that to ask of God that sign which God bade him ask, would be such a 'tempting' of Him as is there forbidden; 'I will not tempt the Lord' (Isai. vii. 12). Not otherwise we are told that the adversaries of the Lord 'came, and tempting desired that He would show them a sign from heaven' (Matt. xvi. 1), that is, putting Him to the proof, refusing to accept, without this proof given, his claims to be the Messiah. And when Satan would have the Saviour to cast Himself down headlong from the pinnacle of the temple, this would have been in the strictest sense, as He Himself declares, a 'tempting' of the Lord his God, that is, a putting of Him to the proof, as being doubtful, until that proof was made, whether He would indeed help and save.

¹ Tertullian (De Pudic. 16): Est hoc solenne perversis et idiotis et hæreticis, alicujus capitali ancipitis occasione adversus exercitum sententiarum Instrumenti totius armari.

God may 'tempt' man as often as He will ; for there is always an element of weakness in every man, justifying the temptation, which shall either reveal this weakness to him through a fall, and thus send him to the source of all true strength, or through a victorious struggle with it, leave him in fuller possession of God's strength than before. But men may never lawfully 'tempt' God, in whom there are no such discoveries to be made, and whom then they honour most, when they believe the highest, noblest, greatest things about Him to which their hearts can attain. It was for Christ to believe in the loving-kindness and faithfulness of God, that He would uphold Him in all his ways, without 'tempting' or putting Him to proof, as the adversary had suggested. Such a tempting could only have sprung from a secret unbelief; and would have been for Him an abandonment at the outset, of that life of faith which He came to live on earth, and by which to overcome the Wicked One.

In this refusal of Christ's are implicitly condemned all who run before they are sent, who thrust themselves into perils to which they are not called; all who would fain be reformers, but whom God has not raised up and equipped for the work of reformation; and who therefore for the most part bring themselves and their cause together to shame, dishonour, and defeat; with all those who presumptuously draw drafts on the faithfulness of God, which they have no scriptural warrant to justify them in believing that He will honour.

It is well known that in the different Gospels this second temptation and the third follow in different order. In St. Matthew the temptation to vainglory ('Cast Thyself down') comes first, and that to worldliness ('All these things will I give Thee') follows after; while in St. Luke first the kingdoms and their glory are offered, and only when these are rejected, the temptation to spiritual pride is suggested. Which, it may be asked, was the true, or rather the actual, succession? for both orders may in a deeper ideal, though not in an historic sense, be true. In favour of St. Luke's it may be urged that spiritual wickednesses seem the latest and subtlest temptations of the Evil One; those who have overcome all other, are exposed to, and sometimes overcome by, these; the white devil, as one has said, being more to be feared than the black; and temptations arranged to follow in such a sequence and method as shall be most effectual (μεθοδεῖαι πλάνης) are especially attributed to Satan (Ephes. iv. 14; vi. 11). But on the other hand, in favour of St. Matthew's succession it may be said that the words, 'Get thee behind Me, Satan,' would scarcely occur in the middle of the Temptation, being rather the final and authoritative dismissal of the Tempter, after which he would no longer presume, for the present at least, to molest the Lord. And altogether this fact seems to outweigh the arguments which support the other succession; not to say that St. Matthew's 'then' (ver. 5) and 'again' (ver. 8) mark a closer knitting together of the incidents in the order of time than aught in the more loosely connected scenes in St. Luke.¹

'Again the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them; and saith unto Him, All these things will I give Thee, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me.' The inner connexion between this third temptation and that which went before may be as follows: 'Well, if Thou art not the Son of God, as is plain from thy inability to make bread, thy refusal to cast thyself boldly forth on the riches of his grace, worship me, and receive what I will give Thee, the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.' By these last words I understand all which the kingdoms possessed of fairest, richest, best, the flower and crown of all their splendours gathered to a head (Isai. xxxix. 2; Matt. vi. 29; Rev. xxi. 25, 26). But before we proceed further it is worth while to enquire how we are to understand the 'shewing' to Him of all these. An optical illusion is entirely inadmissible; such is not reconcilable with the Church's idea of her divine Head. It is quite impossible that in anything, great or small, He can have been played upon or deceived, least of all by the Spirit of lies.¹ That Satan pointed out the quarters in which the several kingdoms of the world lay, does not seem to me altogether to satisfy and exhaust the force of this 'sheweth;' least of all when we bring in St. Luke's 'in a moment of time;' ² although many interpreters have been satisfied with such an explanation.³ Jeremy Taylor reaches out after something more: 'By an angelical power he draws into one centre species and ideas from all the kingdoms and glories of the world, and makes an admirable map of beauties, and represents it to the eye of Jesus.' But whatever the manner of the shewing

¹ In Greswell's Dissertations there is one On the Order of the Temptations, vol. ii. p. 192. Von Meyer (Blätt. für höhere Wahrheit, vol. v. p. 262) thinks the succession to have been differently given by the different Evangelists, of a purpose and for our instruction, because the order of these temptations is different in different men, and in the same man at different times. Aquinas, who has anticipated so much, has anticipated also this (Summ. Theol. pars 3^a, qu. 41, art. 4): Videntur Evangelistæ diversum ordinem tenuisse; quia quandoque ex inani gloria venit ad cupiditatem, quandoque e converso. Augustine (De Cons. Evang. ii. 16) does not absolutely decide in favour of one order or the other.

¹ Grotius strangely enough, while he allows this (neque oculos neque vim imaginatricem Christi illusam puto), suggests notwithstanding a mere phantasmagoria of this kind: Nimirum quasi in picturâ ponens [diabolus] omnem qui unquam esset regis fortunæ apparatus. The suggestion of Milton (Par. Reg. iv. 40) is different; and is not attended by the same objections:

'By what strange parallax or optic skill
Of vision, multiplied through air, or glass
Of telescope, were fruitless to enquire.'

² Ἐν στιγμή χρόνου=ἐν ἀτόμῳ ἐν βραχὺ ὀφθαλμοῦ (1 Cor. xv. 52).

³ Origen: Διέγραψε τῷ λόγῳ τὴν οἰκουμένην, . . . πῶς γὰρ ἡδύνατο αὐτοῖς τοῖς τόποις εἰς ἓνα τόπον πρὸς θεωρίαν σωματικὴν ἀγαγεῖν; Maldonatus: Reipsâ ostendisse, non ita ut viderit, sed ita ut cujusque regni plagam digito designaverit. Bengel: Per enumerationem et indigitationem fortasse. So Aquinas, Summ. Theol. pars 3^a, qu. 41, art. 4.

was, a shewing rather than a telling is skilfully imagined, as might have been expected from the great artificer of falsehood. The eye is the inlet of desire; there is nothing so soon enticed and led away. 'It is,' as Bishop Andrews has said, 'the broker between the heart and all wicked lusts that be in the world' (Job xxxi. 1, 7).

I have quoted the words in which this proffer of the kingdoms of the world is made, as more briefly recorded by St. Matthew. At the same time the qualifying addition which appears in the report of St. Luke is very significant: 'All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it.' Liar as he is from the beginning, the Tempter does not venture to claim the kingdoms of the world and their glory as of absolute right his own. Manichæans enough there are in the world, who believe that the devil is really its lord and king; but he in whose favour the Manichæan explanation of the world's riddle has been started, does not himself venture to assert it. The world is not Satan's own; nor his at all except in so far as it has been 'delivered' to him; that through it and the countless seductions which it offers he may on the one hand exercise and prove the faith of God's elect, to their greater final reward, on the other seduce those who are waiting and willing to be seduced from their allegiance to their liege Lord and rightful king; or that in other ways he may work out the higher ends of God's providence and grace. So far indeed it had been suffered to come into his hands; he is now, in Christ's own words, 'the prince of this world' (John xii. 31), in the words of his apostle, 'the prince of the power of the air' (Ephes. ii. 2), 'the god of this world' (2 Cor. iv. 4); able to give to those who serve him, 'his power, and his seat, and great authority' (Rev. xiii. 2). But whatever dominion he possesses in it, he possesses not of right, but by usurpation on his part, by permission upon God's, even as he himself must acknowledge here. To him it might be said, as to one of his servants it was said, 'Thou couldest have no power at all, except it were given thee from above' (John xix. 11). This was originally no wicked world (Gen. i. 31); a 'mundus' indeed, but no 'mundus immundus,' as Augustine so often loves to declare.

Satan is playing for a high stake, and does not grudge therefore to make a great offer. It is not often that Bishop Andrews allows himself in irony so fine and so effective as he does in one of his Sermons on the Temptation; contrasting this offer, the kingdoms offered to Christ and rejected by Him, with the unutterably paltry bribes, the mess of pottage (Gen. xxv. 34), the Babylonish garment (Josh. vii. 21), the two changes of garments (2 Kin. v. 23), the thirty pieces of silver (Matt. xxvi. 15), for which we are so often contented to barter all. I cannot refuse to quote a part: 'There be some that will say, They were never tempted with kingdoms. It may well be; for it needs not, when less will serve. It was Christ only who was thus tempted; in Him lay a heroical mind that could not be allured with small matters. But with us it is nothing so, for we esteem far more basely of ourselves. We set our wares at a very easy price; he may buy us even dagger-cheap, as we say. He need never carry us so high as the mount. The pinnacle is high enough; yea, the lowest steeple in all the town would serve the turn. Or let him but carry us to the leads and gutters of our own houses, nay, let us but stand in our windows or our doors, if he will give us but so much as we can there see, he will tempt us thoroughly; we will accept it and thank him too. He shall not need to come to us with kingdoms. If he would come to us with thirty pieces, I am afraid many of us would play Judas. Nay, less than so much would buy a great sort, even "handfuls of barley and pieces of bread" (Ezek. xiii. 19). Yea some will not stick to buy and sell the poor for a pair of shoes, as Amos speaketh. . . . A matter of half a crown, or ten groats, a pair of shoes, or some such trifle will bring us on our knees to the devil.'

But this temptation, how mighty an attraction it must have had—not indeed that attraction for Him on whom it was now brought to bear, which it would possess for mean and vulgar souls; but one which the very love and pity and yearning sympathy for all the children of men that dwelt in Him, must have lent it. Nothing was more righteous than that all the kingdoms of the world should be Christ's, nothing more certain than that He, as Messiah, should one day be heir of all. Feeling then and knowing Himself to be the rightful king of men, and to have the power of infinitely blessing them as their king, with such prophecies going before of his kingdom and what his kingdom should be, as Isai. xxxii. 1-8, Ps. lxxii.; He must have unutterably desired, and it belonged to the perfection of his nature that He should so desire, that the kingdoms of the world should be his. How many bleeding hearts were waiting to be bound up by Him; how many who now sat in darkness were waiting for light from Him; what truths were waiting for Him to utter; what wrongs were waiting for Him to redress, what strongholds of oppression for Him to cast down. The power of accomplishing all this, of redressing all the oppressions of the earth, of stanching all those fountains of tears, of imparting all that knowledge of his Father's love, this was 'the glory,' the δόξα, which the royalty of the world wore in his sight; here was the allactive force which this temptation possessed. We note ever, even among the sinful children of men, that the nobler the character of a man, the nobler also the semblance which a temptation, that is indeed to exercise any power upon him, must assume. Sordid sins, sins of a manifest selfishness, will have little or no seductive power, nay, will rather repel than attract him. The temptation may be a messenger of Satan's, but it must in some sort know how to transform itself into an angel of light, before it can obtain a hearing from him, or at all events before it can mightily allure. And if this be true of men in whom is any nobleness of nature, how much more must it have been true in respect of Him who was the noblest of all.

At the same time, when we are seeking to measure what was the dynamic force of this third temptation, we must not leave out of account, as an element herein, that in this offer lay the prospect of evading and overleaping all the toil and pain and suffering, to which otherwise a Saviour of the world was bound in. The kingdoms of the world should be his, as an easy gift; instead of being, as otherwise they must be, a painful prey wrung at the cost of his own life's blood from the usurper. It is from this point of view, and from vividly realizing to ourselves the mighty temptation which the prospect of thus escaping the cross, and not drinking the cup, must have had for Him who knew all which that cross and that cup meant, that we must explain that 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Matt. xvi. 23), with which at a later day Christ rebukes the chief of his apostles, when he too must needs play the Hinderer, and with his 'That be far from Thee' (ver. 22), would fain persuade his Lord that the suffering of many things was not, and need not be, his portion; that there was another way besides that by the steps of his cross whereby He might ascend to his throne. The saying has perplexed many. Could He who spoke no random word, for whom Satan was the personal embodiment of all evil, have called by this name a servant of his own, visited a passing fault of his with so terrible a rebuke? They have recoiled from admitting this; and yet how escape the admission? In this way, I believe. Christ saw with the lightning glance of his spirit in the words of St. Peter a suggestion not so much of his as of Satan's; who was using the servant, and making him the organ and unconscious instrument by which he brought to bear his engines of temptation against the Master. Christ beheld Satan, so to speak, lurking behind Peter, suggesting by him, as he had in the wilderness suggested more directly, that there was a shorter way to the kingdom of his glory than by the cross of his shame; and to him the words are properly and primarily addressed; although in reaching him enough glances off from them to constitute a wholesome and most real rebuke for Peter. The words of rebuke which are spoken then are precisely the same as those spoken now, to mark that the Lord recognized in the remonstrance of Peter the recurrence of a temptation, whose strength He had known before, and no doubt still knew; but which He had already met and overcome.

But the price to be paid for that power of prodigally blessing others, in which after all lay the main stress of this temptation, what was that to be? It was no more than an act of homage to him from whom He should receive the investiture of the kingdom. This price before now men not altogether mean or base, men not altogether without noble aspirations for the good of their fellow men, have consented to pay; having persuaded themselves that a righteous end justified the unrighteous means, that the power ill-gotten might yet be so well used as to cause the fraud, or violence, or other wrong by which it was obtained to be forgotten altogether. Some among those who ended with being the very worst and wickedest in the French Revolution, saw, no doubt, an ideal kingdom floating before their eyes, which they were striving to realize, and which they linked with good for many, and not merely with some selfish good for themselves. But while no other way of bringing about that which they desired seemed open to them, they were willing, that so they might hasten and make sure the coming of this kingdom, to fall down and worship Satan; and what hideous service they rendered him at the last is written in such characters of blood as will leave their names a hissing and an execration for ever. And that act of homage which the Tempter now asked of Christ, what did it imply? Simply that of Christ He should become Antichrist—nothing short of this. Height and depth are but two aspects of the same fact; and just as Lucifer, ‘son of the morning,’ could only fall as he did fall, the height to which he was exalted being the measure of the depth to which he fell, and, fallen, could not be any other than the prince of darkness, so for Him who was tempted now there was no alternative but to be the Christ, or if not this, to be Antichrist. No wonder that such a proposal should call forth such an answer as it does.

Hitherto the suggestions of the Wicked One, however fraudulent, have been capable of a favourable interpretation; the first might have been called forth by sympathy, however ill-timed, with the Lord's hunger; the second by the desire, however premature, that He should openly assert the dignity of his person and office, and make manifest to all the world his dearness to God. But this is capable of no such favourable interpretation. The Tempter has shown himself now in his true colours, one who can no more be so much as mistaken for an angel of light, but manifestly the leader of the great apostasy from the worship and service of the true God. Therefore the altered tone of the reply: 'Get thee behind me, Satan.'¹ The divine patience gives room now to the divine indignation, such as the character of this suggestion required. He who simply declines an infamous proposal inadequately satisfies the claims which virtue and honour, outraged and insulted in his person, make upon him. Indignation in such a case is not merely justifiable, but is required, is of the essence of a true righteousness. Such an indignation speaks out in this reply of Christ.

And now He proceeds to justify the word of defiance to the outrage with which He has replied, even as with such only He could reply, to the last proposal of the Tempter; to justify to the fearful name of 'Satan,' adversary, opposer of all good, which He has given him. This He does from a word from the Scripture, to act in direct disobedience to which that adversary would fain have induced Him: 'for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve'—'written' at Deut. vi. 13, and again at x. 20; cf. Rev. xix. 10. Out of the mouth of the Son of God there might have proceeded a two-edged sword of his own (Rev. i. 16); but 'the sword of the Spirit' which he prefers to wield is again the written word; even as armed with this He comes victoriously forth from his third and last encounter with the foe. 'Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name' (Ps. cxxxviii. 2). 'Blessed is he,' exclaims Bishop Andrews here, 'that has his quiver full of such arrows.'

¹ Ὑπαγε ὀπίσω μου (cf. 2 Kin. ix. 18, ἐπιστρέφε πρὸς τὸ ὀπίσω μου), rendered by Tyndale 'Avoid, Satan,' by the Rhemish, 'Avaunt, Satan,' is strangely enough rendered in our Version in two different ways, 'Get thee hence, Satan,' in Matthew; 'Get thee behind Me, Satan,' in Luke. The words belong properly only to the earlier, having been brought by transcribers to the later, Gospel, from the text of which they are now omitted in the best critical editions.

'Then the devil leaveth Him,' or, in the far more noticeable words of St. Luke, marking two important points which St. Matthew had passed over, 'And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from Him for a season.' We observe first the words, 'all the temptation,' which we shall scarcely press too far, if we infer from them that the three temptations just recorded, with which our great Forerunner was assailed, embrace the whole circle of human temptation, so that we have here the evidence, to use Jackson's words, of 'Christ's mastery over Satan at his three principal weapons.' These 'three principal weapons' we are wont to express under the three terms, the world, the flesh, and the devil; answering, as has often been observed, to the three enumerated by St. John, 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life' (1 John ii. 16).¹ In the suggested gratification of the appetite, contrary to the will of God, was the temptation of the flesh; in the proffered kingdoms with their glory, the temptation of the world; while, although all the temptations were from the devil, yet that was especially the devilish temptation which said to Him that in vain-glory and spiritual pride He should cast Himself headlong from the pinnacle of the temple; another 'son of the morning' (cf. Isai. xiv. 12), but falling from a far higher height than any from which ever his Tempter fell.

Nor should we fail further to observe the very noteworthy parallelism between this Temptation which Christ surmounted in the desert and that other under which our first parents succumbed in the garden. 'When the woman saw' ('through false spectacles of Satan's making,' as Jackson adds) 'that the tree was good for food' (the solicitation of the flesh), 'and that it was pleasant to the eyes' (the solicitation of the world), 'and a tree to be desired to make one wise' (the solicitation of the devil), 'she took of the fruit thereof and did eat' (Gen. iii. 6). In that first sin were the lineaments of every other sin, as in this victory over temptation the lineaments, and very much more than the lineaments, of every other victory.²

¹ Augustine (in loc.): Tria sunt ista, et nihil invenies unde tentatur cupiditas humana nisi aut desiderio carnis, aut desiderio oculorum, aut ambitione sæculi. Per ista tria tentatus est Dominus a diabolo. Cf. De Verâ Relig. 38.

² See on this matter Gregory the Great, Hom. xvi. 2, 3; Aquinas (Sum. Theol. 3^a, qu. 41, art. 4): Non dixisset Scriptura quod consummatâ omnî tentatione diabolus recessit ab illo, nisi in tribus præmissis esset omnium materia delictorum; quia causæ tentationum causæ sunt cupiditatum, scilicet carnis oblectatio, spes gloriæ, et aviditas potentia. Compare Jackson, Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes, viii. ii. 10

Having thus 'ended all the temptation,'¹ launched every one of his fiery darts, and seen them every one fall quenched and blunted to the ground, 'the devil leaveth Him;' for that word shall first be shewn true on the Prince of the faithful, to which each one of his people shall set afterwards his seal, 'Resist the devil, and he will flee from you' (Jam. iv. 7). He 'leaveth Him,' but as St. Luke is careful to add, 'for a season.' Room is left in these words for a later assault, and it is in fact implied in them that such a later assault was in reserve and should in due time arrive. Nor can we be in any doubt in regard of the period to which the sacred historian looks on; that, as one great Temptation signalized the opening of the Saviour's ministry, so another should signalize its close, the Temptation in the wilderness being followed in due time and completed by the Temptation in the garden; even as the Lord Himself, whether looking backward or not, yet certainly looking forward to that second Temptation, when now it was close at hand, exclaimed, 'The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me' (John xiv. 30); nothing, that is, on which he could lay his finger, and claim it for his own.

The two wrestlings with the Evil One differed indeed from one another, and so may be contrasted with one another. Their difference consisted mainly in this, that whereas in the first he brought to bear against the Lord all things pleasant and flattering, if so he might by aid of these entice or seduce Him from his obedience, in the second he thought with other engines to overcome his constancy, tried Him with all painful things, as before with all pleasurable, hoping to terrify, if it might be, from his allegiance to the truth, Him whom manifestly he could not allure. In Augustine's words, having tried the door of desire, and found that closed, he tried afterwards, and with the same unsuccessful issues, the door of fear; the second Temptation of the garden dividing itself, like that of the wilderness, into three acts following close on one another (Matt. xxvi. 44). And the same illustrious teacher goes on to urge that as it was with the Captain of our salvation, so also it must be with every one of those who fight under his banner. They too shall need to tread under foot both the lion and the adder, to resist, that is, now a threatening, now a flattering, world. Indeed, it was with the very purpose of teaching them how they should do all this, that He Himself also suffered being tempted.¹ Jeremy Taylor adds another reason why for our sakes our blessed Lord should have accomplished all the temptation; namely, that keeping this in remembrance, none hereafter, because they were greatly tempted, should therefore misdoubt of the divine love. 'The holy Spirit did drive Jesus into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil. And though we are bound to pray instantly that we fall into no temptation, yet if, by divine permission, or by an inspiration of the holy Spirit, we be engaged in an action or course of life that is full of temptation and empty of comfort; let us apprehend it as an issue of divine providence, as an occasion of the rewards of diligence and patience, as an instrument of virtue, as a designation of that way in which we must glorify God; but no argument of disfavour, since our dearest Lord, the most holy Jesus, who could have driven the devil away by the breath of his mouth, yet was by the Spirit of his Father permitted to a trial and molestation by the spirit of darkness.”¹

¹ Completâ omni tentatione illecebrosâ, is Augustine's significant limitation of these words (De Trin. iv. 13).

¹ Augustine (Serm. cxiii. 2): Ad hoc enim pugnat Imperator, ut milites discant.

‘And behold, angels came and ministered unto Him’—that is, to the Son of man, to the second Adam; even as in Jewish legend they are said to have danced before the first Adam on the day of his creation.² It could not indeed be said that they were here fulfilling that office which in the Epistle to the Hebrews is ascribed to them, as ‘ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation’ (i. 14); for here was not one of these ‘heirs of salvation,’ but the very Author of this salvation to all others. We have in like manner an angel appearing to Him and strengthening Him in another great hour of his temptation (Luke xxii. 43). It is probable that on this occasion they brought food (cf. 1 Kin. xix. 5); the word of the original (διηχονοῦν) may imply as much; and that word, ‘Man did eat angels’ food’ (Ps. lxxviii. 25), may have thus received its highest fulfilment; nor less may they have celebrated with songs of triumph this transcendent victory of the kingdom of light over the kingdom of darkness. So much the Christian poet of our age has suggested:

‘Nor less your lay of triumph greeted fair
Our Champion and your King,
In that first strife whence Satan in despair
Sank down on scathed wing;

¹ Life of Christ, part 1, sect. 9, § 7.

² See Eisenmenger, Entdeckt. Judenth. vol. ii. p. 17. The Mahometans have borrowed this legend from the Jews.

Alone He fasted, and alone He fought;
But when his toils were o'er,
Ye to the sacred Hermit duteous brought Banquet and hymn, your Eden's festal store.'

A few words in conclusion. It is nothing wonderful that the endeavours should have been many, to explain away the Temptation, to exhaust it of its supernatural element, and so to reduce it to the level of an occurrence explicable by the laws habitually at work around us and within us. Now, if our Lord's life had been itself such an occurrence, it would be certainly perplexing to find a fragment of wonder such as this is, intruding into the midst of that life; nor would the instinct be unnatural, which, as it every where desires moral harmony and keeping, should endeavour in some way or another to get rid of an event, out of all such harmony and keeping with the other events of that life. But if the manifestation of the Son of God in the flesh be itself the wonder of all wonders, then that this should be surrounded by a group of secondary wonders, that there should be nothing common in his life, or, to speak more accurately, very much altogether uncommon, this might have been expected beforehand. What would indeed be startling and perplexing would be the absence of every thing supernatural from such a life—the fact that He whose name is Wonderful (Isai. ix. 6) should have fallen at once into the common course and order of things, and never either by what He did, or what was done in respect of Him, have testified that there was any difference between Himself and the other children of men. Those, however, who will not be satisfied until the light which falls upon the earthly path of our Lord, and lights it up with a glory not of earth, has for them faded into the light of common day, have been very busy with this history; and that for a long time past; for it is quite a mistake to suppose that the attempts to explain away the Temptation into a dream, or a vision, or a parable, or an inner conflict, or an encounter with a tempter of flesh and blood, into any thing in short but that which on its face it announces itself to be, are of very recent origin, and belong exclusively to the neology of later years. It is abundantly evident that the Scriptural theologians of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century had earnestly to resist attempts which in their time also were rife, to reduce the Temptation to an every day occurrence.¹

Thus for some the Temptation is a vision. The explanation is untenable. It is manifest that the sacred historians did not mean to relate this event as a vision. When they have to tell of such, they make quite clear what they intend (Acts ix. 12; x. 3, 10; xi. 5; xviii. 9; xxii. 17); and, which goes still more directly to the root of the matter, no one can accept this explanation without implicitly renouncing the Church's faith concerning her Saviour and her Head. Christ had no visions; it lay in the necessity of his divine nature that He should have none. There was never a door opened in heaven (Rev. iv. 1) for Him, before whom the heavenly world lay always manifest and bare (John v. 19, 20). He could not be at one time or another 'in the Spirit' (Rev. i. 10), who was always in the Spirit; the higher spiritual world being no strange element, into which He was rapt at intervals (2 Cor. xii. 21), but his permanent abiding place. He had no special communications or revelations from his Father, inasmuch as his whole life was one of entire and unbroken intercommunion with Him (John v. 17, 19). Even those which might appear such special communications directed to Himself, are carefully explained to have another motive and reason: 'This voice came not because of Me, but for your sakes' (John xii. 30; cf. xi. 41, 42). Massillon speaks very grandly in words quoted below (they are found in a sermon On the Divinity of our Lord), on this absence of all rapture on the part of the Son of God; shows that it was a necessary consequence of his Divinity that He should never at any moment of his life be borne out of Himself, as were the prophets of the Old, and, though more rarely, the apostles and others of the New, Dispensation (Acts x. 10; xi. 5; xxii. 17; 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4; Rev. i. 10).¹ The idea alike of the vision and of the trance or ecstasy is that of a depression or partial suspension of the actings of the lower life, so to prepare for a better reception of impressions or communications from a higher world; the setting of the garish sun of this world, that the pure stars of a heavenly firmament may appear.¹ But in Christ this could have been never needed; in whom existed at all times a perfect balance and harmony of all faculties and powers; in whom there was no predominance of the lower, which could at any instant obscure or stand in the way of the perfect actings of the higher.

¹ It needs only to refer in proof to Wolf, Cursus Philol. vol. i. p. 66, and the many treatises which he enumerates there, from whose titles it is plain that in his time the matter was in eager debate.

¹ Nos prophètes eux-mêmes annonçant les choses futures, sans perdre l'usage de la raison, ni sortir de la gravité et de la décence de leur ministère, entraient dans un enthousiasme divin; il fallait souvent que le son d'une lyre reveillât en eux l'esprit prophétique: on sentait bien qu'une impulsion étrangère les animait, et que ce n'était pas de leur propre fonds qu'ils tiraient la science de l'avenir, et les mystères cachés qu'ils annonçaient aux hommes. Jésus-Christ prophétise comme il parle; la science de l'avenir n'a rien qui le frappe, qui le trouble, qui le surprenne, parcequ'il renferme tous les temps dans son esprit; les mystères futurs qu'il annonce, ne sont point dans son âme des lumières soudaines et infuses qui l'éblouissent; ce sont des objets familiers qu'il ne perd jamais de vue, et dont il trouve les images au-dedans de lui; et tous les siècles à venir sont sous l'immensité de ses regards comme le jour présent qui nous éclaire.

The same objection, only in a greater degree, forbids an explaining of the Temptation as a dream, which, indeed, is only a subordinate kind of vision; namely that it is impossible to reconcile it with the idea of the Son of God. Even servants of God, who have made any considerable advances in the spiritual life, are seldom communicated with in this manner. Rather the dream is the channel of communication with the heathen, with an Abimelech (Gen. xx. 3), a Laban (Gen. xxxi. 24), a Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. ii. 1; iv. 5), a Pilate's wife (Matt. xxvii. 19), with the wise men from the East (Matt. ii. 12); or with others who, standing higher than these, yet in the measure of their spiritual attainments fall very far below the more eminent saints of God, a Solomon for instance (1 Kin. iii. 5); and it is expressly brought out as part of the dignity of Moses, that while God spoke, and made Himself known to other and inferior prophets by visions or dreams, He spoke mouth to mouth with him (Num. xii. 5-8; Deut. xxxiv. 10).² How much more then would there belong to the Son of God at every moment the perfect clearness of waking vision. Indeed all mental illusions of every kind were so far from Him that I must needs esteem it a mistake when in Paradise Regained Milton makes Him to dream of feasts in his hunger in the wilderness.

¹ Augustine (De Div. Quest. ii. qu. 1) defines an ecstasy, Mentis alienatio a sensibus corporis, ut spiritus hominis divino Spiritu assumptus capiendis atque intuendis imaginibus vacet.

² See J. Smith, Select Discourses, pp. 169, 254, for an interesting account, bearing on this very matter, of what the Jewish Doctors called the gradus Mosaicus of prophecy, and its superiority over all other.

Another attempt to empty the Temptation of its mysterious element was made in the seventeenth century, and taken up in the beginning of our own by Paulus and by others. They saw in the Tempter here a mortal man, an emissary from the Sanhedrim, or possibly the High Priest himself, who would fain try of what metal this youthful prophet from Galilee, to whom the Baptist had just borne such glorious witness, was made, and whether he might not be seduced and bribed into the service of the old corrupt theocracy ; instead of witnessing against it and its ministers, as the examples of the earlier prophets and many perilous indications in the Baptist's career, made too probable would be the course He would take.¹ This cannot need more than to be stated and left. Unbelief has its cast-off garments, of which even itself is now ashamed, and this is of them.

The suggestion of others that the Temptation was a conflict on our Lord's part with no outward but an inward foe, with the solicitations of appetite, of ambition, of worldliness, which, born in his own mind, sought to draw Him away from the narrow and painful path appointed for his treading, is equally untenable, and this for reasons which have been stated already ; namely that it is directly contrary to the idea of a Saviour, who as such must be a Holy One, and this absolutely and completely, that thoughts soliciting to evil should have thus spontaneously risen up within Him. Christ could be tempted only from without; not from within.¹ Coming as He did, not in this sinful flesh of ours, to which evil is native, and in which it inevitably rises up, but coming, as the apostle expressly tells us, 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' (Rom. viii. 3), where the 'likeness' is plainly introduced to qualify the 'sinful,' for with the flesh itself He had not likeness, but identity (1 John iv. 2; John i. 14), evil could in no other way be present to Him.²

See Spanheim, Dub. Evang. 51.

One more proposed explanation will complete the list. All the foregoing ones, if they are not really reconcilable with the sacred narrative, are yet presented by their advocates as being so. They have none of them avowedly cast off allegiance to the Word of God, as that within the limits of which they must move, and by which they must submit to be tried. But there are who withdraw from this narrative all real historic foundation whatever, who see only a mythus here; that is, who see in this victorious encounter of the Prince of Light with the prince of darkness a portion of that fabulous halo of glory with which the infant Church encircled the head of its Founder; not thereby meaning to deceive; but unconsciously giving an outward shape and subsistence to the hopes, yearnings, expectations, and desires, which filled its heart as to what the Messiah ought to be, and therefore what He must have actually been. Strauss¹ ingeniously gathers up the Old Testament preparations for the growth of such a mythus as this, the rudiments of it which we may trace there; as that Moses and Elijah had both fasted their forty days; that Israel, the collective son of God, as Christ was the personal Son, had been tempted forty years in the wilderness, with much more of the same kind.² This must stand or fall with the whole mythical scheme of the Gospel; and it would be lost labour to undertake its refutation here. Only I will observe that the nearest real parallel to our Lord's Temptation which the Old Testament actually offers, he has not referred to. It is furnished by the history of Solomon (1 Kin. iii. 5-15). The resemblance, indeed, is only a remote one; yet assuredly it was a temptation, when the Lord, appearing to the youthful king, and offering to him what he would, gave him the opportunity of choosing riches or long life in place of the heavenly wisdom, if so he had been inclined. At the same time in his case, as one comparatively weak in all the actings of the spiritual life, the temptation came from God and not from Satan, and did not therefore concentrate in itself the whole power of temptation.

¹ There is an essay by Gelbricht (I have never seen it), An male de animo Jesu sentiendum sit si ô πεπρωτων εν τη ἐφημερâ Christus ipse, i. e. mentis ipsius cogitata fuerint? Aldeb. 1815. How the writer answers the question which he thus puts I do not know. How he ought to have answered it, there can be no doubt. Ullmann (Sündlosigkeit Jesu, 5th edit., p. 116 sqq.) answers it in the negative, does his best to show that the absolute sinlessness of the Saviour is not brought into question by the admitting of such an explanation of the Temptation, but in this fails altogether.

² Augustine (Serm. clxxxiii. 8) Misit Deus Filium suum non in similitudinem carnis, quasi caro non esset caro, sed in similitudinem carnis peccati, quia caro erat, sed peccati caro non erat.

The mythic parallel which meets us in heathendom, although wanting an historic basis, and thus only painted as upon a cloud, is much nearer—that, I mean, of Hercules, when at the beginning of his course he beheld before him the two ways, of pleasure, and of toil, and was severally solicited to walk in the one and in the other. And the parallel will be felt to be closer, if only we will keep in mind that heroic character of his life and work, which many of the later legends about him have done so much to obscure, substituting mere strength and animal good-nature in its room. It was not thus that he was conceived at the first; but rather as the man who in a noble devotedness to his fellows girded himself up to undergo all labours and to affront all dangers for their sakes. Buttmann in his interesting essay upon Herakles¹ seeks to prove that this 'Temptation of Hercules' is not a later addition to the legend, which we owe to the sophist Prodicus, but lay in the heart, and belonged to the original stuff, of the mythus. And since it is certain that any man who has ever wrought, or who is conceived as having wrought, anything deserving of memory for his fellow-men, could only have effected this by such a noble postponement of pleasure to duty, and that this postponement, which acted itself perfectly out in the Son of God, must, though in weaker forms, act itself out anew in every champion of the truth, and can scarcely help coming to a head at some turning point of his life, there is nothing improbable in this supposition.

¹ Leben Jesu, 1837, vol. i. p. 471 sqq.

² Compare Gfrörer, Das Jahrhundert des Heils, vol. ii. p. 379-387.

¹ In the Mythologus, vol. i. p. 246; compare Pauly, Real-Encyclopædie, vol. iii. p. 1180.

2. THE CALLING OF PHILIP AND NATHANAEL.

John i. 43-51.

WE are told of Saul, that when 'he saw any strong man, he took him unto him' (1 Sam. xiv. 22); and as we read the catalogue of David's worthies (2 Sam. xxiii. 8-39), we may well believe that he in no other manner filled the ranks of his host. And as these the ancient kings, as Saul and as David, so too the Son of David, the true King of Israel, wherever He saw any man 'fit for the kingdom of God,' He claimed him for his own, 'took him unto Him.' This He did not by any exercise of outward power, but by those secret attractions which draw the brave to a braver, the noble to one noblest of all. In this first burst of his ministry, his triumphs in this kind rapidly succeed one another. 'The day following,' following, that is, the day on which He enlisted three of the foremost among his future disciples, He makes two more his own; these also great ones, even though they may not attain to the first three. On this day 'He would go forth into Galilee;' the words imply that He was about to undertake the journey thither, but had not actually begun it; 'and findeth Philip.' The fact that Philip, though born a Jew, for he should be one of the twelve apostles of the Lamb, thus bears a Greek name, and he is not the only apostle who does so, is a remarkable illustration of the extent to which Galilee ('Galilee of the Gentiles'), had been hellenized, penetrated through and through with the customs and language of Greece. It is well worthy of note how often this finding recurs in this chapter; Christ finding disciples as here; disciples finding each his friend, as at ver. 41, 45; and reporting how they have at once been found by, and have themselves found, the Messiah (ibid.). It is the chapter of the Eureka's.

Thus finding Philip, He 'saieth unto him, Follow Me.' This 'Follow Me' might seem at first sight no more than an invitation to accompany Him on that journey from the banks of Jordan to Galilee, on which He was just setting forward. It meant this (thus compare Matt. ix. 9; Luke v. 27); but at the same time how much more. It was an invitation to follow the blessed steps of his most holy life (Matt. xvi. 24; John viii. 12; xii. 26; xxi. 19; Rev. xiv. 4), to be a partaker at once of his cross and his crown. How much of this Philip may have understood at the moment it is impossible to say; but whether much or little, he is not disobedient to the heavenly calling. No doubt he had been more or less prepared for it by some accounts which he had obtained from his fellow-townsmen Andrew and Peter, of what had passed between them and the Lord on the day preceding. As much is intimated by the Evangelist in his mention exactly at this point of his narrative, that 'Philip was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter,' a fact which at once accounted for the acquaintance into which he had been brought with all which had passed between them and the Lord.

But Philip, being himself thus 'masterfast'—if it be permitted to revive a word which with others of a similar termination, as 'rootfast,' 'shamefast,' 'bedfast,' did useful service in the language once¹—cannot be content till he has introduced his friend into the glorious liberty of the same service with himself, until he has done what in him lies to make his friend a sharer of his treasure and his joy. It could not be otherwise; for if in one sense this treasure of the kingdom of heaven is one, 'which when a man hath found, he hideth' (Matt. xiii. 44), in another sense it is one which will not let him rest till he has made others partakers of the same. 'Philip findeth Nathanael,² and saith unto him, We have found Him of whom Moses in the Law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.' There is error and imperfection still cleaving to his own knowledge. In all likelihood Nazareth was at this time for him the birthplace of the Lord—not an unimportant error, though slight as compared to that which 'son of Joseph' would have involved, had he held fast to it after better teaching, had it belonged to any other than the rudimentary period of his faith.

Strangely enough De Wette and others have argued from these words, thus faithfully recording the first impressions of Philip, his imperfect theology, and the extent to which partial error was mingling still with the truth which he had learned, not that he at this time, but that St. John when he composed his Gospel, either knew nothing of the birth at Bethlehem and the miraculous Conception, or gave no credit to them. The fact is that

¹ It appears in Skelton, The Paston Letters, and elsewhere.

² The name, which corresponds to our Theodore (Gift of God), occurs in the Old Testament. A Nethaneel is prince of the tribe of Issachar (Num. i. 8); one too of David's elder brothers bears this name (1 Chron. ii. 14); and eight other Nethaneels are mentioned there.

St. John, as a truthful narrator, records not what Philip, if at that time he had been better instructed, ought to have said, but what in that twilight of his knowledge he actually did say; even as it is not in the least wonderful that in one brief interview he had not become acquainted with the most secret and mysterious events in the life of his future Lord; events of which even apostles themselves only obtained gradual glimpses, as they were able to bear them. The partial error which claved to Philip's faith did not hinder him from grasping that central truth which in good time would detach from itself whatever, not of its own nature, was cleaving to it. He is sure that this whom they have found is He 'of whom Moses in the Law' (see Gen. iii. 15; xlix. 10; Num. xxiv. 17, 19; Deut. xviii. 15-19) 'and the prophets' (see 2 Sam. vii. 12-16; 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7; Isai. vii. 14; ix. 6; liii.; Ezek. xxxiv. 23-31) 'did write.'

One weak point in Philip's statement, one apparent flaw in the credentials of the Messiah whom he announces, Nathanael detects at once; for indeed his objection, 'Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?' contains more than a reference to the general low esteem and disrepute in which Nazareth was held (Matt. ii. 23), the unlikelihood therefore that aught preeminently good would come forth from it. The difficulty which he feels, and which in consistency with his guileless character he at once expresses, is the same as theirs who somewhat later objected, 'Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the Scripture said that Christ cometh out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was?' (John vii. 41, 42; cf. ver. 52); the difference between him and those other gainsayers being, that he gladly dismisses his difficulty yearning as he does to believe ; while they gladly cling and hold fast to theirs, exempting them, as it seems to do, from the unwelcome necessity of believing. This 'good thing,' which Nathanael is persuaded that Nazareth cannot yield, must be understood as that one 'good thing,' that 'gift of God' (John iv. 10), in which all other good things are included ; and is a distinct reference on the part of one not probably unversed in the prophecies which went before of Christ, to the clear fore-announcing in them that Messiah's going forth in time should not be from Galilee, therefore not from Nazareth, but from Bethlehem in Judæa (Mic. v. 2).

Philip's 'Come and see,' which is all the reply he makes to the objection of his friend, is manifestly an echo of Christ's 'Come and see' of the day preceding (ver. 39). That immediate personal intercourse which had proved so effectual in the case of Andrew and another (Philip, as has been noted already, had no doubt heard from his fellow-townsmen how they had been won for the truth), shall not prove less effectual in the case of Nathanael. It was a wise answer then, and is often a wise one now. The highest heavenly things are in their nature incapable of being uttered in words, and 'Come and see, come and make proof of them,' is sometimes the only true reply to difficulties about them, an indication of the only effectual way by which those difficulties shall be removed. There are truths in the heavenly world which, like the sun in the natural world, can only be seen by their own light ; which in no other way will be seen at all. Philip has a confidence which the result abundantly justified, that in that holy presence, if only he could bring his friend within the range of its influence, all preconceived objections would dissolve and disappear. Perplexities might still remain, but he would be content to adjourn the solution of them to a later day, which indeed is what faith is summoned to do evermore.

He who 'knoweth the proud afar off, his eyes are also on the faithful of the land that they may dwell with Him' (Ps. ci. 6); and in Nathanael He recognizes at once one of these. Him therefore He prevents with that word of highest praise, saying, not to him, but yet of him, and intending that he should hear, 'Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile.' 'An Israelite indeed,' Nathanael pertained not only to that Israel after the flesh of which St. Paul speaks (1 Cor. x. 18), but to the 'Israel of God' (Gal. vi. 16), which the apostle is so careful to distinguish from it; a Jew not outwardly, but inwardly (Rom. ii. 28, 29; ix. 6; Phil. iii. 3); in whom this name of highest honour was not merely a name, or worse than this, a contradiction of all which he truly was (Rev. iii. 9); but who fulfilled in his innermost life all whereof that name was the promise and the pledge. 'Israelite' was the title which on many accounts the Jew was best pleased to bear. There were others who were Abraham's seed as well as he; the Ishmaelite and the Edomite; but 'Israelite' was a title exclusively his own. And then too it was the theocratic title (Acts ii. 22; iii. 12; v. 34; xiii. 16; Rom. ix. 4; xi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22); a record of the glorious achievements of their forefather Jacob; a name which he had won from God Himself, when by faith and prayer he had prevailed even with Him (Gen. xxxii. 28). He who knew what was in man declares of Nathanael that he is a true descendant of this Israel; not of Jacob merely; for in Jacob, the supplanter, there was guile: it was indeed the most marked fault and failing of his character (Gen. xxvii.; xxx. 37-43; xxxi. 20), until that character had been ennobled and elevated by a divine discipline, till he had struggled out of Jacob into Israel (Gen. xxxii. 24-32; Hos. xii. 4).

At the same time this absence of guile which Christ imputes to Nathanael must not be pressed too far. This guileless nature is as the kindly soil in which all excellent graces will flourish (Luke iii. 21; viii. 15; x. 6); but does not do away with the necessity of the divine seed, out of which alone they can spring. He who is 'without guile' is not therefore without sin; this, at least, could only be asserted of One (1 Pet. ii. 2); but rather he is one who seeks no cloke for his sin; does not excuse, palliate, hide, diminish, or deny it. Being a sinner, he confesses it, and thus finds pardon for the sin which he confesses. So David had declared long ago (Ps. xxxii. 1, 2); to whose words Christ is probably here distinctly referring.¹

Some have enquired, How did the Lord know of Nathanael that he was this true Israelite which He here avouches him to be? Was it from any previous familiarity? It may have been so in part. He who knew what instruments He would need for the work which He was meditating, may before this have seen in Nathanael, or heard about him, what gave Him assurance that there were fitnesses in him for a future disciple, perhaps for a future apostle, even for one of the twelve foundation stones of the Heavenly Jerusalem. Yet there is not the slightest necessity for assuming such a previous acquaintance. Christ read, as often as He needed to read, not merely the present thoughts, but also so much as He desired of the past histories, of those who came in contact with Him ; and this He did not merely by that natural divination, that art of looking through countenances into souls, interpreting the inner life from the outward bearing, which all men in a greater or less degree possess, and He doubtless in the largest measure of all (Isai. xi. 3); but 'in his spirit' (Mark ii. 8), by the exercise of that divine power, which was always in Him, though not always active in Him. It was thus, for example, that He read the life-story of that Samaritan woman (John iv. 17, 18; cf. v. 14); where it is impossible to presume a previous acquaintance; it was thus far most probably in the instance before us.

¹ Augustine (in loc.) has excellent observations: Quid est, in quo dolus non est? Forte non habebat peccatum? forte non erat ager? forte illi medicus non erat necessarius? Absit. Nemo hic sic natus est ut illo medico non egeret. . . . Si dolus in isto non erat, sanabilem illum medicus judicavit, non sanum; . . . videt istum sanabilem quia dolus in isto non erat. Quomodo dolus in illo non erat? Si peccator est, fatetur se peccatorem esse. Si enim peccator est, et justum se dicit, dolus est in ore ipsius.

This simplicity or absence of folds, this guilelessness or absence of deceit, which the Lord imputes to Nathanael, reveals itself in his reply, 'Whence knowest Thou me?' There is no affectation here of declining the praise ; no seeming to consider it as a compliment which he does not rightly deserve ; but only a question of admiration how the Lord should have known him so exactly, and declared him so truly. And then in proof that this was no happy guess, no random arrow which, shot at a venture, had yet hit the mark, the Lord refers him to some circumstance which we do not exactly know, but which Nathanael entirely understood : 'Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the figtree, I saw thee.' The mere sitting of an Israelite under his figtree was of itself too common an occurrence (1 Kin. iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10) to yield such a sign. It is plain that our Lord must here refer to some passage, outward or inward, in Nathanael's life, most probably inward and spiritual, some earnest prayer, some great mental struggle, the overcoming, it may be, of some strong temptation, which under that fig-tree had lately found place; immediately, as it would seem, before Philip had found him, and invited him to Jesus; for that call too the Lord declares to be known to Him; known therefore as well, though not imputed, the slighting words with which Nathanael at first received the invitation. Now however he makes altogether good that hasty speech which he uttered then. This word of Christ is enough; he feels as the Psalmist, 'O Lord, Thou hast searched me and known me; Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways' (Ps. cxxxix. 1, 3); feels that He before whom he stands is a searcher of hearts; and at once that full and free confession of faith, which only the confessions of Peter (Matt. xvi. 16), of Martha (John xi. 27), and of Thomas (John xx. 28), all those too at much later periods of Christ's ministry, matched or surpassed, 'Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God, Thou art the King of Israel,' breaks forth from his lips.

A word or two upon each of these ascriptions, being as they are, the first an acknowledgment of the dignity of Christ's person, the second of the greatness of his office.¹ And first, 'Thou art the Son of God.' We do not here suppose for an instant that Nathanael, giving this title to the Lord, intended by it all which the Nicene Fathers intended, and which we intend, by the same; and yet nothing less was wrapped up in that title, to be unfolded from it in due time. And it meant much, even on Nathanael's lips, and was no mere language of honour uttered at random. How much it meant we may clearly perceive from the active opposition, the earnest hostility, which this title awoke on the part of the Scribes and Pharisees, as often as the Lord implicitly or explicitly claimed it as his own (John v. 18; x. 30-39). But however these may have denied the superhuman character of Messiah, there were enough glimpses of this in the Old Testament to explain how as many as had searched more deeply into it, or whose vision was less obscured and distorted by preconceived prejudices, should have recognized in Him one who was partaker of the divine nature, and therefore 'the Son of God.' It is sufficient to refer to Ps. ii. 7, 12; Isai. ix. 6. We are then justified in ascribing nothing short of such a recognition to Nathanael.

¹ Bengel: Confessio de personâ et officio Christi.

And the words which follow, 'Thou art the King of Israel,' words in which the 'Israelite' accepts, owns, and does homage to Israel's king, avouches himself a subject of his,¹ amount very nearly to the same thing. He who said in that second Psalm, 'Kiss the Son lest He be angry' (ver. 12), said also of the same, 'Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion' (ver. 6; cf. Zeph. iii. 15; Isai. ix. 7; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6). In all these passages the identity of Israel's King and Israel's God is plainly involved; and the same looks plainly out from many other prophecies concerning the Messiah, as eminently from the 72nd Psalm.

¹ Lampe: Et quia testimonium quod Jesus ei tanquam vero Israëlita exhibuerat, conscientia bona fretus admiserat, hinc sigillatim suum nomen inter subditos hujus regni profitetur, ac Jesu tanquam suo legitimo Regi in obsequium se addicit.

But to him that hath shall be given. He who hears and believes shall one day walk not by faith, but by sight. Thus shall it fare with Nathanael. 'Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the figtree, believest thou? Thou shalt see greater things than these. And He saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.'¹ This 'Verily, verily,' this double amen, which here occurs for the first time, is peculiar to St. John; he only records our Lord's use of it, but he on very many occasions. It comes most fitly from the lips of Him, who is Himself the

¹ This is the first occasion in the recorded Evangelical history upon which our Lord used and applied to Himself the name of 'Son of man.' Bengel's note on this phrase is a wonderful specimen of the close packing of matter the most interesting and the most important in his Gnomon. There are materials in this note which it would not be very difficult to expand into a volume. I quote a part: Frequens apud Evangelistas et diligentissime observanda est hæc nomenclatura, quâ nemo nisi solus Christus, a nemine dum Ipse in terris ambularet nisi a semetipso, appellatus est Filius hominis. Primum Joh. i. 52, ut primum reperti fuere qui Eum Messiam et Filium Dei (ibid. ver. 50) agnoscerent; et deinceps sæpissime, ante prædictionem passionis et post. Nam ab iis qui fidem in Ipsum suscipiebant, dictus est Filius David. Recte suspicati sunt Judæi, eâ designari Messiam (Joh. xii. 34). Nam ut Adamus primus cum totâ progenie dicitur Homo, sic Adamus secundus (1 Cor. xv. 45) dicitur Filius hominis; non eâ notione quâ filius hominis, id est tenuis, opponuntur filiis viri, id est potentibus (Ps. xlix. 3), quâve homines communiter dicuntur filii hominum (Marc. iii. 28; Ephes. iii. 5; Ezek. ii. 1, et passim), sed cum articulo ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. Videtur articulus respicere prophetiam, Dan. vii. 13. Unus hic nempe homo est, quem Adamus, post lapsum, ex promissione expectavit pro totâ suâ progenie; ὁ δεύτερος, secundus (1 Cor. xv. 47), quem omnis prophetia Veteris Testamenti indigitavit, qui totius generis humani jura et primogenituram sustinet (Luc. iii. 23, 38) et cui uni, quod humani nominis nos non pœniteat (Ps. xlix. 21), debemus (Rom. v. 15). Porro hæc appellatione Christus, inter homines ambulans, et expressit et pro œconomia illius temporis occultavit (cf. Matt. xxii. 45) inter homines, et Satanam celavit, se esse τὸν Υἱὸν, Filium absolute dictum, id est Filium Dei, promissum datumque homini (Gen. iii. 15; Isai. ix. 6), ortumque ex homine (Heb. ii. 11), perinde uti uno exaltationis vocabulo et crucem et glorificationem suam insignivit (Joh. xii. 32).

Amen (Rev. iii. 14), the God of truth (Isai. lxv. 16), in whom all the promises of God are Yea and in whom Amen (2 Cor. i. 19; cf. Num. v. 22; Neh. viii. 6). How different too the majestic, 'I say unto you,' of Christ from that, 'Thus saith the Lord,' of all the prophets preceding—they bearers of the word of another, He the utterer of his own. In the promise itself with which the Lord rewards the commencing faith of Nathanael (cf. Ezek. i. 1; Matt. iii. 6; Acts vii. 55; x. 11) we are at once, as by almost all expositors ancient and modern is admitted, thrown back upon that wondrous ladder which Jacob saw, reaching from earth to heaven, with the Lord at the summit, and angels of God ascending and descending upon it (Gen. xxviii. 12).¹ What Israel saw, the true 'Israelite' shall behold the same;² yea what one saw but in dream, the other shall behold in waking reality; and more and better even than this; for then God was a God afar off; the Lord stood above the ladder and spake from heaven; but now standing at its foot, He speaks as the Son of man from earth, for now the Word has been made flesh; and the tabernacle of God is with men (Rev. xxi. 3).

¹ Witsius indeed (Mélot. Leid. p. 296) suggests that the reference here may after all not be to this passage, as we all take for granted, but to another: Non diffiteor interim fieri potuisse ut et alio respexerit Dominus. Magnam affinitatem cum hoc dicto habet Dan. vii. 13, 14, ubi Messias vocatur Filius hominis, et repræsentatur ut Filius Dei, veniens in nubibus cœli ad Antiquum Dierum, additurque datum ei esse dominatum et regnum. Quum itaque professus esset Nathanaël Jesum esse Filium Dei et Regem Israël, utrumque admittit Jesus, protestaturque se revera esse filium hominis, de quo prophetaverit Daniel, quod manifestum futurum ipse præ-nunciat ex insigni illo ministerio sibi ab angelis exhibendo. Nam sicut ad majestatis divinæ gloriam facit quod thronus Antiqui Dierum myriadibus angelorum cinctus sit, ita et argumentum cœlestis regni in filio hominis est, quod iidem angeli ad ipsius nutum quaquaversum volent, adscendentes et descendentes prout jusserit. This is certainly ingenious; but does not shake one's conviction that the other and generally received allusion is the true one.

² Augustine (Serm. cxxii. 5) Quasi diceret, Cujus nomine te appellavi, ipse somnium in te apparebit. Cf. Con. Faust. xii. 26. Grotius: Quod ibi in somnio vidit Israël idem vigilans visurus dicitur verus Israëlita.

At the same time there is that in this promise of Christ which has at all times perplexed interpreters not a little. This is plain from the omission of 'hereafter,' or 'from henceforth,'¹ in many Greek copies; the absence of which, however, while it might lighten, would not remove the difficulty; as again from various gratuitous suppositions, as of some special, though unrecorded, vision of angels vouchsafed to Philip and Nathanael. It appears not less in the fact that several expositors, Augustine for instance uniformly,² explain away these 'angels' into messengers of the New Covenant, apostles and others, who should find in Christ the middle point of all their spiritual activity—going forth from Him, and returning to Him (Luke x. 1, 17). These all can only be regarded at the best as devices for escaping such difficulties as this passage may offer, not as methods of solving them. Equally unprofitable, and leading as little to a true solution, are all those enquiries as to whether this word of Christ's might not have been fulfilled at the Baptism, when we are told that the heavens were divided (Mark i. 10; cf. Ezek. i. 1), or at the Temptation, when angels ministered to Him (Matt. iv. 11), or at the time of the Agony, when an angel strengthened Him (Luke xx. 43), or at some other moment when we may presume angels in especially near communion with the Lord. He who thus asks when this promise was fulfilled, declares by the fact of making such an enquiry that he has failed to enter into the meaning of the promise. We can select no single moment as that in which it found its fulfilment, because it was being fulfilled evermore.

¹ 'Απ' αὐτοῦ, which some suppose to have found its way here from Matt. xxvi. 64.

² Con. Faust. xii. 26; Enarr. in Ps. xliv. 8; In Ev. Joh. Tract. 7.

Assuredly the Lord would indicate by these wondrous words that He should henceforward be the middle point of a free intercourse, yea, of an uninterrupted communion, between God and men; that in Him should be the meeting place of heaven and of earth (Ephes. i. 10; Col. i. 19); which should be no longer two, as sin had made them, separated and estranged from one another, but one, now that righteousness had looked down from heaven, and truth had flourished out of the earth.¹ And this the glory of Christ they, his disciples, should behold, and should understand that they too, children of men, were by Him, the Son of man, made citizens of a kingdom which, not excluding earth, embraced also heaven. From earth there should go up evermore supplications, aspirations, prayers,—and these by the ministration of angels (Rev. viii. 3, 4), if some still want a certain literal fulfilment;—from heaven there should evermore come down graces, blessings, gifts, aid to the faithful and punishment for them that would hurt them (Rev. viii. 5; Acts xii. 7, 23). Heaven and earth should henceforward be in continual interchange of these blessed angels,

¹ Calvin on this point says well: *Multum autem errant meo iudicio qui anxie quærunt tempus et locum, ubi et quando Nathanaël et reliqui cælum apertum viderint. Potius enim quiddam continuum designat, quod semper extare debebat in ejus regno. Fateor quidem aliquoties discipulis visos fuisse angelos, qui hodie non apparent; . . . sed si probe reputemus quod tunc factum est, perpetuo viget. Nam quum prius clausum esset regnum Dei, vere in Christo apertum fuit. Chemnitz (Harm. Evang. c. 25): Docet igitur Christus, officium suum esse cælum aperire, et cælestia rursus conjugere cum genere humano, quod per peccatum et a Deo et a sanctis angelis avulsum fuerat. It is very noticeable that the only occasion on which that phrase of depth and meaning inexhaustible, namely, 'the kingdom of God' (βασίλεια τοῦ θεοῦ), occurs either in the Old Testament or the Apocrypha, it is with a manifest allusion to Jacob's dream, in which dream, vouchsafed to the patriarch, it is said, 'Wisdom shewed him the kingdom of God' (Wisd. x. 10).*

‘And earth be changed to heaven, and heaven to earth;
One kingdom, joy and union without end:’

the Son of man, Jesus of Nazareth, being the central point in which these two kingdoms met,¹ the golden clasp which bound them indissolubly together.² And so it is only according to the right order that these angels should be described as first ascending, and only then descending; when we might rather have anticipated that they would have descended first, and ascended afterwards. The order of priority here can only be rightly understood, when we lift ourselves above all notions of space or room or of a local heaven. The angels needed not to come down on the Son of man, before they went up from Him; but where He was, there were they. The person of the Son of man was, so to speak, the point of starting for them; and because the Lord here contemplates Himself not as in heaven but on earth, they therefore ascend first, and only afterwards descend.³

¹ Calvin: Ideo super ipsum ascendere et descendere dicuntur: non quod illi soli ministrent, sed quod ejus respectu atque in ejus honorem complectantur suā curā totum Ecclesiæ corpus.

² The heathen parallel to this of Jacob’s ladder, thus binding heaven and earth together,—that which is, as it were, a feeling after this glorious union which Christ here at once proclaims and constitutes,—is the golden chain by which poets feigned that this earth of ours was linked to the throne of Zeus.

³ Plato in a beautiful passage (Symp. 23) describes the middle powers which maintain the commerce between heaven and earth, gods and men, in language that forcibly reminds us of this of our Lord. I will quote his words, for though sufficiently familiar, I have never seen them brought into relation with the Scripture before us: καὶ γὰρ πᾶν τὸ δαιμόνιον μεταξύ ἐστὶ θεοῦ τε καὶ θνητοῦ, ἐρμηνεύον καὶ διαπορθμεύον θεοῖς τὰ παρ’ ἀνθρώπων, καὶ ἀνθρώποις τὰ παρὰ θεῶν, τῶν μὲν τὰς δέσεις καὶ θυσίας, τῶν δὲ τὰς ἐπιτάξεις τε καὶ ἀμοιβὰς τῶν θυσίων· ἐν μέσῳ δὲ δι’ ἀμφοτέρων συμπληροῖ, ὥστε τὸ πᾶν αὐτὸ αὐτῷ συνδεῖσθαι.

A few words in conclusion on the question whether this Nathanael of St. John is one and the same with the Bartholomew of the synoptic Gospels. The identifying of the two, which, when once suggested, carries so much probability with it, and which in modern times has found favour with so many, was quite unknown to the early Church. Indeed Augustine more than once enters at large into the question, why Nathanael, to whom his Lord bore such honourable testimony, whom He welcomed so gladly, was not elected into the number of the Twelve. The reason he gives is curious. He sees evidence in Nathanael's question, 'Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?' that this disciple was a Rabbi, learned in the wisdom of the Jewish schools (that he should be numbered among fishermen, John xxi. 2, makes this unlikely, yet not impossible); but such the Lord would in no case choose to lay the foundations of his Church (cf. 1 Cor. i. 26); lest that Church might even seem to stand in the wisdom of man rather than in the power of God.¹ The arguments for the identity of the two, which identity was first suggested, I believe, by Rupert of Deutz in the twelfth century, are very strong. They are mainly these; that Nathanael's vocation here is coordinated with that of apostles, as of equal significance; that on a later occasion we meet him in the midst of apostles, some named before him, some after (chap. xxi. 1, 2); that the three earlier Evangelists never mention Nathanael, the fourth never Bartholomew; that Philip and Bartholomew in the catalogue of the apostles are grouped together, as a pair of friends, but with Philip first, even as he is here the first in Christ (Matt. x. 30; Mark iii. 18); that the custom of double names seems to have been almost universal at that time in Judæa, so that all or well nigh all the apostles bore more than one; to all which may be added that Bartholomew is no proper name, signifying only son of Tolmai. All these arguments in favour of the identity, with nothing against it, bring it very nearly to a certainty, that he to whom the promise of the vision of an opened heaven, with angels ascending and descending on the Son of man, was vouchsafed, was no other than Bartholomew the apostle.

¹ Enarr. in Ps. lxxv. 2; In Ev. Joh. tract. vii. § 17. Cf. Gregory the Great (Moral. xxxiii. 16): Prædicatores infirmos abjectosque habere studuit Dominus; unde in Evangelio Nathanaëlem laudat, nec tamen in sorte prædicantium numerat; quia ad prædicandum eum tales venire debuerant, qui de laude propria nihil habebant.

82 THE CALLING OF PHILIP AND NATHANÆL.

3. CHRIST AND THE SAMARITAN WOMAN.

John iv. 1—42.

It is very characteristic of the Eastern colouring of Scripture, that so many of its most interesting events should find place in the neighbourhood of wells, and in one way or other stand in some direct connexion with them. By a well of water the loveliest idyllic scene in Genesis, rich as it is in such, I mean the first meeting of Abraham's servant with the future wife of Isaac, is laid (Gen. xxiv. 11—28); there Jacob's first greeting of Rachel (Gen. xxix. 1—10); with a well too is closely linked an important passage in the life of Moses (Exod. ii. 17). But deeper, more attractive, laying a mightier hold on the Church in all aftertimes than any or all of these, is the discourse which found place by Jacob's well, of which we have a record in the fourth chapter of St. John.

The Evangelist explains to us first what the circumstances were which brought it about: 'When therefore the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, . . . He left Judæa and departed again into Galilee.' This quitting of Judæa and retiring to the safer Galilee as here recorded, I identify with Matt. iv. 12, Mark i. 14, Luke iv. 14, in the synoptic Gospels. As Christ had taught his disciples that there were occasions when they might withdraw from the malice of their foes (Matt. x. 23), so He was Himself withdrawing here. That malice, as He knew, would be roused to the uttermost by the manifest successes of his ministry, by the multitude of disciples whom He had baptized—more even than the Baptist himself (iii. 26–30); although the mere ministerial act of baptism, as the Evangelist is careful to note, He accomplished by other hands than his own; ‘though Jesus Himself baptized not, but his disciples’ (cf. Acts x. 48; 1 Cor. i. 14–16), He reserving the baptism with the Holy Ghost for Himself. He had left Judæa, the head-quarters of all the bitterest opposition to Himself and to his work; and as, in retiring to Galilee, He did not choose to take the circuit of Peræa, which was the manner with some of the stricter sort of Jews, who would come into no contact whatever with the heretical Samaritans, ‘He must needs go through Samaria.’¹ St. John is thus careful to note that this was no mission to the Samaritans which the Lord undertook. On the contrary, the law which He imposed on his disciples, ‘and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not’ (Matt. x. 5), this, during the days of his flesh, He imposed also on Himself. He was not sent ‘but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Matt. xv. 24; Acts xiii. 46); and if any grace reached Samaritan or heathen, it was, so to speak, but by accident, a crumb falling from the children’s table.

‘Then cometh He to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar.’ The unusual form in which the name of this city here appears, must not hinder us from recognizing in it the Sichem where Abraham built an altar (Gen. xii. 6); under the oak in whose neighbourhood Jacob buried the idols of his household (Gen. xxxv. 4); the city which

¹ See Josephus, Vita, § 52.

Simeon and Levi so cruelly and treacherously wasted, forfeiting their birthright thereby (Gen. xxxiv. ; xlix. 5-7); not far from which Joseph was sold (Gen. xxxvii. 12); the last resting place of his bones (Josh. xxiv. 32) ; a city thus of ancient fame in Scripture, as of great political importance at some periods of Jewish history ; so much so that in all likelihood, had the tribe of Ephraim attained to the leadership of the nation instead of Judah, had this tribe not forfeited and let go the preeminence which it possessed for a time (Ps. lxxviii. 67), Shechem instead of Jerusalem would have been the metropolis of the kingdom. It was in Joshua's time the centre to which the tribes were gathered (Josh. xxiv. 1) ; the seat of the abortive kingdom of Abimelech (Judg. ix.) ; a city twice mentioned by the Psalmist (Ps. lx. 6 ; cviii. 6) for no other reason than its dignity and strength ; the place whither the ten tribes were gathered on that fatal day when the great schism of the nation actually began, and for a while the chief city of the revolted ten (1 Kin. xii. 1, 25), that is until the capital was transferred first by Jeroboam to Tirzah, and finally by Omri to Samaria (1 Kin. xvi. 14).²² With the building by the Samaritans of the temple on Mount Garizim, of which more presently, Shechem, standing immediately at the foot of the mountain on the ridge or saddle that joins it to Mount Ebal, became the ecclesiastical metropolis of the Samaritans, the middle point of their worship, and continues such to this day for the feeble remnant of them which survives.¹

¹ It is now known as Nablus, a corruption of Neapolis, which name was given to the city by the Herodians, who in the Roman times adorned and in part rebuilt it. On all which concerns Nablus, Garizim, the Samaritans of the past and of the present, see Robinson's Researches in Palestine, vol. iii. pp. 92-139. There is much too of original information in the article

But if 'Sychar' be thus identified with Sichem, or Sychem (Acts vii. 16), and only a few, as Ewald for example, refuse to identify them, how are we to account for the form which the word has here assumed? We must for this keep in mind the enigmatic character of St. John's Gospel, the mystical significance which he loves to trace in names, either to find or to suggest (see ix. 7; xi. 16). His Gospel, apparently less, is indeed far more, thoroughly steeped in the Old Testament, connected with it by finer and subtler links, than any one of the other three. A change in the form of the word, if only it were significant, would be quite in the spirit of the Old Testament, and in agreement with the importance which names everywhere there assume; being continually modified, now for the better, as Abram into Abraham (Gen. xvii. 5), Sarai into Sarah (Gen. xvii. 15), Oshea into Jehoshuah (Num. xiii. 16); now for the worse, thus Bethel into Bethaven (Hos. x. 5), Achan, because he troubled Israel (Josh. vii. 25), reappearing as Achar (1 Chron. ii. 7); or it may be that a new name is superadded to the old (Gen. xxxii. 28; xxxv. 10; Judg. vi. 32), sometimes puts the old quite out of use; this new also being sometimes for honour, or more rarely for dishonour.

How deeply seated in our nature this tendency to the changing or modifying of names is, the curious ways in which it is evermore at work, springing as it does out of a sense that the name connotes, or if it does not connote, should be made to connote, the thing which is named, there need no examples to prove.¹ Nor has the kingdom

Samaria, in Herzog's Encyclopædia, vol. xiii. pp. 359-391; and also in Heidenheim's Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift, No. i. pp. 1-43; 78-128, who, p. 14, gives further notices of the literature on the subject.

¹ Various illustrations of this tendency to bring the name and the thing of grace refused to avail itself of this instinct, as the many instances just cited in proof abundantly testify. St. John by this turn of the word, which has brought it into closest connexion with the Hebrew for a lie, declares at what rate he esteemed the whole Samaritan worship, declares by anticipation at what rate it was esteemed by his Lord (see ver. 22). If religion be anything higher than the expression of man's spiritual needs and desires, if it rest not on what man has thought and felt about God, but on that which God has revealed about Himself, and only has worth as it is the true revelation by God of Himself to his creatures, then that whole worship was a hollow thing, a husk with no kernel within; and, professing as it did to be much more than this, was a lie. If it sound severe on the part of the beloved apostle to say thus, and if some urge, as against this explanation of 'Sychar' put here for Sichem, that he never could have said it, one can only reply that the truth is severe, that in very faithfulness it must declare darkness to be dark, and bitterness to be bitter; cannot affirm that the one is light, or the other sweet; or, when men have left God's truth, and are worshipping instead of this some invention of their own, that their worship is any other than a lie.

This city was 'near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph' (Gen. xxxiii. 19; xlviii. 22; Josh. xxiv. 32). '*Now Jacob's well*¹ was there.' Of Jacob's into a real relation with one another I have given in The Study of Words, 12th edit. pp. 24-30.

¹ It would certainly have been preferable to render πηγή here by 'fountain' or 'spring' than 'well;' for we can better understand 'a springing fountain' than a 'springing well' (ver. 14). Πηγή and φτεap, it may be observed, are used now the one, and now the other, throughout this chapter: but there is always sufficient reason to account for the use of one or of the other: thus. πηγή twice in this verse, and at verse 14, φτεap at verses 11, 12.

well there is no mention in the Old Testament; though we learn there that it was the custom of the patriarchs to dig wells (Gen. xxi. 30; xxvi. 18). There seems no reason whatever to call in question its identity with the well which the Samaritans of the neighbourhood designate by this name to the present day. The digging of it must have been a work of enormous labour. Maundrell, who visited it in 1697, gives this account: 'It is dug in a firm rock, and contains about three yards in diameter, and thirty five in depth, five of which we found full of water.' The rock has since crumbled, or in other ways the well has been in part filled in, and a recent measurement gives a depth of seventy five feet only, the spring at the bottom being choked. 'Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus¹ on the well; and it was about the sixth hour.' The weariness of Christ, so soon to be the refreshment of one, should in due time be the refreshment of all. St. John perhaps may name the exact hour, in this way to bring more vividly to our consciousness the oppression and burden of the time; it was 'the sixth hour,' exactly the heat of the middle noon. Yet we must not leave out of sight that elsewhere he notes the hour,

Our Translators, who have rendered both by 'well' have failed to mark the alternation of words; which the Vulgate has noted, rendering the first by 'fons,' the second by 'puteus.' And indeed 'all the Old Versions except the Anglo-Saxon render the Greek literally, giving a different term for πηγή and for φρέαρ' (Malan, Notes on the Gospel according to St. John, p. 49). The two Augustine here discriminates well (In Joh. Evang. Tract. 15): Omnis puteus fons, non omnis fons puteus. Ubi enim aqua de terrâ manat et usui præbetur haurientibus, fons dicitur: sed si in promptu et superficie sit, fons tantum dicitur; si autem in alto et profundo sit, ita puteus vocatur ut fontis nomen non amittat. We have φρέων πηγή, Prov. v. 15.

¹ Οὕτως, which may be explained with Chrysostom, ἀπλῶς καὶ ὡς ἐτυχε. Bengel: Sic, uti qualiscumque loci opportunitas ferebat, sine pompâ, solus, ut qui non præ se ferret expectationem Samaritidis, sed meræ lassitudinis causâ quietem vellet capere. Admiranda popularitas vitæ Jesu!

where it is difficult to say what of emphasis the story gains thereby, as i. 39 ; xix. 14. Perhaps here, as there, it is the significance of the event, which makes its every detail of interest to himself, and as he judges to his readers. ✓

'There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water;' a woman,¹ not of the city of Samaria, for that was some six miles distant, but of the country (so Acts viii. 5), still called by the name of that city which had been once its capital. To that same well she oftentimes may have come already ; day by day, perhaps, during many a weary year in the past. And now she came once more, little guessing how different was to be the issue of this day's coming from that of all the days which had gone before.² The benefit and blessing which here lay, as it were, in ambush for her, was not indeed, as she was fain at the first to imagine, that she should never need to come and draw water from that well again (ver. 15) ; but, far better than this, that in the midst of that and all other the weary toil, outward and inward, of this earthly life, she should have within herself a fountain of joy, springing up unto life eternal, should draw water with joy from un-failing wells of salvation.

She had probably already filled her pitcher, when the stranger at the well, whom she may have seen only to avoid, for she recognized in him those unmistakeable features of Jewish physiognomy with which the Samaritans had nothing in common, to her surprise addressed her, and to her greater surprise addressed her with a request ;

¹ The Roman martyrology knows her name, Photina, the names also of her children.

² Augustine: Venit mulier ad puteum, et fontem quem non speravit, invenit.

'Give me to drink' (cf. Gen. xxiv. 16, 17). A real thirst, witnessing against all docetic notions concerning the person of the Lord (cf. John xix. 28; Matt. xxi. 18), was one motive of his request; though that which He most truly thirsted after was her faith, the salvation of her soul;¹ for we see hunger and thirst not so much forgotten as disappearing (ver. 31, 32) in the joy of winning such a lost soul for the kingdom of his Father. In this request of his, and in the discourse to which it was the prelude, there was a threefold testimony against the narrow-heartedness of his age and people—against that of the Jew who hated the Samaritan, of the Rabbi who would have thought scorn to hold this familiar intercourse with a woman (see ver. 27), of the Pharisee who would have shrunk from this near contact with a sinner (Luke vii. 39).

The notice which follows, 'for his disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat,' is commonly interpreted, as explaining the constraint under which He lay of asking this favour of the woman. The disciples were gone, and had left Him 'nothing to draw with' (ver. 11), such as, had they been present, would have been at his command. But how very unlikely that such should have been part of their travelling gear; or if so, that they should have carried it with them into the town. The notice interposed here has no such superficial meaning. The Lord, allowing the disciples all to leave Him, had of intention made this solitude for Himself, that He might the easier win to repentance and confession of sin the poor sinner for whom He had appointed this meeting, though she knew it not;¹ for while there is none who may not take to himself that beautiful line of the Dies Irae,

¹ Augustine: Ille autem qui bibere quærebat, fidem ipsius mulieris quærebat.

Quærens me sedisti lassus,

to her of first and best right it belongs. This absence of theirs was designed, was part of his counsel of love in her behalf. The freedom from interruption which it afforded He now improves to the uttermost; for, Himself the great 'Fisher of men' (cf. Luke v. 10), He is as watchful and eager to take a single soul by the angle as a vast multitude of souls at once by the casting net or the sear; giving here a lesson to those whom He sends into the world to 'catch men,' which they will do well never to forget. Hengstenberg, indeed, thinks that all had not left, that St. John was a witness of the interview which he describes; but for this there is no shadow of ground.

He who asks a favour places himself, in the estimate of a common mind, though often it is exactly the contrary, in a position of inferiority to the person from whom the favour is asked, and with whom it lies to grant or to withhold it. And thus there was a certain satisfaction which she could not conceal, a gratifying of her national vanity, wounded so often by Jewish taunts, in thus having a Jew a petitioner for a favour from her, a Samaritan. The humiliation, for such she esteemed it, was much greater than if she, a Samaritan, had been a suitor for an equal favour from a Jew; inasmuch as the holding aloof and the refusing to be on terms of communion, either social or ecclesiastical, had been at the first, and still was, mainly on the side of the Jews; who denied, rightly as regarded the fact, though wrongly in respect of the temper in which they did it, that the Samaritans had any claims to be considered as heirs with themselves of the promises made to Abraham and his seed. It was, as St. John expresses it, for the words are not the woman's, but his, the Jews that would 'have no dealings with the Samaritans,' no familiar intercourse, that is, and indeed none of any kind which they could avoid; and only as a consequence necessarily involved in this, that the Samaritans had no dealings with the Jews; and so it had been from the beginning (Ezra iv. 1-3). The woman therefore, not certainly a daughter of Rebekah in this (see Gen. xxiv. 17-20), instead of complying with his request, asks, with a feeling that for the present the tables are turned, and with the intention that He shall feel this also, 'How is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?' An Israelite she would have called herself, for such the Samaritans claimed to be, as descending from the tribe of Ephraim. A 'Jew' for them was one of the tribe, or at most of the kingdom, of Judah.

¹ Corn. à Lapidè : Factum id est tacitâ Dei providentiâ, ut, discipulis omnibus in urbem dimissis, solus ipse, liberius cum muliere impudicâ ejus pudori consulens ageret.

If we take this as the temper out of which her question proceeds, the Lord's reply will then exactly meet the thought of her heart. He is not the receiver, but the giver. 'Thou errest in thinking that it is I who need thy help, when thou rather hast need of mine. If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of Him, and He would have given thee living water.' This 'gift of God' has been very variously interpreted. Augustine understands by it the Holy Ghost. Hengstenberg will not allow that there can be any question on the matter, but refers to Isai. ix. 5, 'to us a Son is given,' and to John iii. 16, as decisive proofs that Christ designated Himself as 'the gift of God.' By 'the gift of God' Grotius and others understand the Lord more generally to mean that gracious and golden opportunity vouchsafed to her, and as yet to her alone among all her people;¹ 'If thou knewest this, and what it is to have met Me here, the Saviour of the world, thou wouldest have been a petitioner of mine, for a far better gift than any I have sought at thy hands.' Lampe, citing Rom. vi. 23, where 'eternal life' is styled 'the gift of God' (χάρισμα there, δῶρον here), and strengthening his position by the aid of such passages as Isai. lv. 1; Rev. xxii. 17, understands generally that 'eternal life' to be 'the gift of God,' whereof here the Saviour speaks. But these explanations, one and all, seem to me either too vague and indefinite, or otherwise beside the mark; and the right interpretation to have been strangely overlooked by most expositors; not indeed by all, for Stier has it. To me this carries such conviction that, unless so many had missed, I should have been tempted to say that it was impossible to miss it. 'The gift of God' is here an anticipation of what is immediately to follow, namely, 'He would have given thee living water.' 'If thou knewest,' the Lord would say, 'that God has given to souls thirsting in the wilderness of this world water of life, such as will slake the thirst, not of their bodies but of their souls, and "who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink," even He that has that water to bestow, whom the Father has made to be Himself a fountain and spring of this life, then, instead of moving the embers of that wretched quarrel between Samaritans and Jews, thou

¹ Occasio nempe quam tibi nunc Deus præstat, quantumvis Samaritidi.

wouldest have asked these waters at his hands.' The 'living water' seems to me, beyond all doubt, to be itself 'the gift of God' whereof Christ speaks.¹

Having asked for water He sets forth this 'gift' under the image of water; as at John vi. 48-51, where men are waiting on Him for the bread that perishes, He sets forth the same under that of bread. In this as in every thing else a pattern to those who come after, He links on the heavenly to the earthly, uses the earthly as a ladder by which He mounts up to the heavenly. At the same time He must have been quite prepared for a temporary misunderstanding of his words. 'Living water' is not necessarily equivalent with 'water of life' (Rev. xxi. 6; xxii. 1, 17) in the highest spiritual sense of the words. On the contrary there are natural waters which have, and in their lower sphere deserve, this name; that is, fresh springing waters, as contrasted either with rain-water gathered into cisterns, or indeed with any other, the water of reservoirs; and in this natural sense the phrase often occurs in the Old Testament; as at Gen. xxvi. 19; Lev. xiv. 5; Cant. iv. 15.² Here, however, the words are used in their highest sense,—waters, which coming from Him in whom is the absolute life, who is the αὐτοζωή (John i. 4; v. 40); impart life to as many as they reach. We have a magnificent symbolism of this, the life-giving power of these waters, Ezekiel xlvii. 9: 'Every thing shall live whither the river cometh;' that is, the river issuing from under the threshold of the House of God (ver. 1; cf. Rev. xxii. 1; Joel iii. 18; Zech. xiv. 8).

¹ There is a singular decorum in the use of words here. The woman has said, not unnaturally, 'How is it that Thou askest (αἰτῆς) of me?' But αἰτεῖν is a word of petition as from an inferior to a superior, in this different from ἐρωτᾶν, which has more of equality in it (see my Synonyms of the New Testament, § 40). But when Christ refers to that request of hers, He does not take up and allow her word. It is not on his lips, 'who it is that asketh of thee,' but 'who it is that saith to thee' (ὁ λέγων σοι); while the asking He goes on to describe as the proper attitude for her; 'thou wouldest have asked (ἤρπας) of Him.' There lies often in little details like this an implicit assertion of the unique dignity of his person, which it is very interesting and not unimportant to trace.

² In all these places the LXX. have ὕδωρ ζῶν, = vivum flumen, vivus fons, in Latin.

Yet although she misses the deeper meaning of his speech, taking the figurative literally, and the spiritual naturally (cf. John iii. 4; vi. 53), there is that in the words and bearing of this Stranger, which has already so far inspired her with respect, that the 'Sir,' which was absent from her first answer, finds place in her second; however she may hardly maintain herself through the whole of her answer at the level of respect which this opening word would imply. Indeed she proceeds with the evident intention of showing Him that these pretensions of his involve an absurdity: 'Thou hast nothing to draw with,¹ and the well is deep; from whence then hast Thou this living water? From this well it cannot be that Thou wilt draw that living water of which Thou speakest, for the well is deep' (as we have seen, more than a hundred feet deep, with only a few feet of water at the bottom), 'and Thou hast no means with which to draw it up. And even if Thou hadst discovered another well'

¹ The ἀντλήμα here, 'bucket' in most of our early Versions, 'hauritorium' in Augustine (which word has not found its way into any of our Dictionaries of later Latinity), must not be confounded with the ὕδρια or water-pot which the woman presently leaves behind in her haste to communicate her good tidings to her people (ver. 28). It is the 'situla, generally made of skin, with three cross sticks tied round the mouth to keep it open. It is let down by a rope of goats' hair, and may be seen lying on the curb stones of almost every well in the Holy Land' (Malan). We may suppose the woman to have held this in her hand, while she talked to the Lord, and reminded Him that He had nothing of the kind.

(for this is the connexion of ver. 11 and 12), ‘art Thou greater than our father Jacob’ (cf. viii. 52), for such she calls him, though with no shadow of right¹ (Matt. x. 5); ‘who gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children;’—or ‘his sons’ rather, ‘since one daughter to twelve sons would not make them τέκνα τοῦ Ἰακώβ in a narrative written in Greek’ (Malan),—‘and his cattle.’ The word rendered ‘cattle’ (θρέμματα) probably includes household servants as well. That Jacob himself and his sons should have drunk of that well might be taken as an evidence of its sweetness, that his servants and flocks and herds should have drunk of it, of its abundance,² the waters of it thus satisfying the needs of him and of all that were his. ‘Art Thou greater,’ she would imply, ‘that so Thou couldst give to those waters, even if Thou couldst discover such, a higher consecration, or constitute them waters of greater price to us than these with which the patriarch Jacob has endowed us?’ There speaks out in this question of hers a certain slight resentment at what seems to her an intentional depreciation of this holy well, for such no doubt it was esteemed by these Samaritans. That well was one of the venerable memorials of the past (it is possibly alluded to Gen. xlix. 22; Deut. xxxiii. 28), by aid of which they sought to put themselves in connexion with the early patriarchal history. It lay, as we have seen, in the parcel of ground given by Jacob to his son Joseph (ver. 5, 6), and it was from Joseph that the Samaritans boasted their descent. This we should conclude from the fact of their claiming to be the representatives of the ten tribes, of which Ephraim, descended from Joseph, was chief; but Josephus twice expressly mentions the fact.¹ Here is the key to the voluble eloquence, not unmixed with a certain tartness, of her reply. The woman suspects, though she cannot quite understand his words, that He, a Jew, means to cast a slight upon the venerable traditions and memorials which her people claimed as especially, if not peculiarly, their own.

¹ Theophylact: πατέρα ταυτῆς ποιῆται τὸν Ἰακώβ, εἰς τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν εὐγένειαν αὐτὴν συναθροῖσα.

² Theophylact: τὸ δὲ καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξ αὐτοῦ ἐπιεν, ἐπαινός ἐστι τῆς τοῦ ὕδατος φθόγγου· τὸ δὲ καὶ τὰ θρέμματα αὐτοῦ, ἐνδεικτικὸν ἐστι τῆς ἀφθονίας.

The Lord does not entangle Himself in a direct reply to the question, 'Art Thou greater than our father Jacob?' which could lead to no result; and yet implicitly He does reply. For as, in magnifying the bread which He would give, as compared with the manna which Moses gave, He reminds his hearers that those who ate the manna died notwithstanding, leaving them to draw the conclusion that He, who gives bread which if a man eat thereof he shall not die, must be greater than Moses, who could give no such 'salve of immortality' (John vi. 49, 50); even so the same follows here: 'I am greater than your father Jacob; for this water which you boast to have received from him does not slake thirst for ever. Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again.' But it is otherwise with the water of which I am the dispenser. Whosoever shall drink of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst.' It is needless to observe of how much wider application the words, 'shall thirst again,' are than to the matter immediately in hand. All human suppliances for the satisfying of the cravings of the body or of the soul, have in them this defect, that they do not satisfy for ever. They only serve to dull and deaden the present sense of Antt. ix. 14. 3; xi. 8. 6.

H

the want, but do not remove it. That want after a while revives again in its strength; for man is full of hunger and thirst; a fact which may, indeed, be his heaven, yet may also be his hell. But the water which Christ gives, slakes the spirit's thirst, and slakes it for ever—not, of course, as though one draught of it would do this; it is he who drinks, and who continues to drink, that shall not thirst any more.

It is worth our while here to note how Christ gathers to a head innumerable promises and invitations of the Old Testament, and claims them as fulfilled in Himself; thus eminently Isai. lv. 1; cf. xli. 18; xlviii. 21; xlix. 10; even as this is by no means the only place in the New Testament where He sets forth the blessings which He imparts to the children of men by aid of the same figurative language, at once so beautiful, so familiar, and so intelligible to all; thus see John vi. 35; vii. 37; Rev. vii. 16; xxi. 6. He is Himself the true 'fountain of Jacob' (Deut. xxxiii. 28); this name He implicitly challenges as his own. There is only One, who can be what Christ here declares that He is, namely, 'a fountain of living waters' (see Jer. ii. 13; xvii. 13), and that is God. On the strength of this saying Augustine rightly claims Ps. xxxvi. 9, 'With Thee is the fountain of life,' as fulfilled in Christ, and brings that passage into closest connexion with this.¹

But what, it may be fitly asked, is the exact force of the promise which follows, 'But the water that I shall give him shall be in him² a well of water springing up into everlasting life'? Is it not this? 'He who receives this living water of Me shall become himself in some sort, although of course only in a secondary sense, a springing well; no cistern merely to contain,¹ but a springing fountain out of which shall flow, these same waters;² shall minister to others the same salvation which has been already ministered to himself;³ even as the Lord expresses the same truth elsewhere: 'He that believeth on Me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water' (John vii. 38). The image of the spark which, fastening where it lights, kindles into a flame and spreads, or of the seed which, taking root, shoots up again into the air,⁴ either of these would lend itself more perfectly to the setting forth of the truth which Christ here proclaims. He does not however think good to travel out of the circle of images which

¹ De quâ ergo aquâ daturus est, nisi de illâ, de quâ dictum est, Apud Te est fons vitæ? Nam quomodo sitient, qui inebriabuntur ab ubertate domus tuæ?

² Origen here asks, τίς δὲ ἐν αὐτῷ ἔχει πηγὴν, ἀνέχουσι οἱ αἰῶνες τε ἔσται;

¹ H. de S. Victore (In Eccles. Hom. 2): Scimus namque quia cisterna idecirco foditur, ut aqua extrinsecus collecta in eam defluat, et ex ea rursum in usus hominum transitura hauriatur. Sed hæc quia venam vivam non habet, quantumlibet magna et aquarum collectione redundans videatur, aliquando exhauriri potest et exsiccari; quia cum sublatum fuerit et consumptum quod aliunde infunditur, nihil ei de suo superest unde reparetur. Sed fons qui vivam habet venam, etiamsi modicus est, deficere tamen omnino non potest, neque effusionis suæ defectum aliquando sentit, cui sine defectu semper de proprio incrementum accedit.

² The imperial philosopher of Rome uttered a great truth, but an imperfect one, saw much but did not see all, did not see that this spring of water must be fed, and fed evermore, from the 'upper springs,' if it is not presently to fail, when he wrote, ἐνδον βλέπε· ἐνδον ἡ πηγὴ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, καὶ ἀεὶ ἀναβλῆναι δυναμένη, ἐὰν ἀεὶ σκάπτῃς. Cf. Plutarch De Virt. et Vit. 1.

³ Origen quotes with approbation Heracleon's interpretation of these words, the same which I have given above: οὐκ ἀπὸ θανάτου δὲ τὸ, ἀλλομένον, διεγέρσασθαι, καὶ τοὺς μεταλαμβάνοντας τοῦ ἀνῶθεν ἐπιχορηγοῦμενον πλουσίως καὶ αὐτοὺς ἐκβλῆσαι εἰς τὴν ἐτέρων αἰώνιον ζωὴν τὰ ἐπιχορηγημένα αὐτοῖς. Gregory of Nyssa, in his Homilies on The Song of Solomon, has some beautiful remarks in the same sense on Cant. iv. 15, where the Bride is compared to 'a well of living waters.' I quote a few words: τοῦτο δὴ τὸ πάντων παραδοξότατον· πάντων γὰρ τῶν φρεάτων ἐν συστήματι τὸ ὕδωρ ἐχόντων, μόνῃ ἡ Νύμφη διεξοδικὸν ἐν αὐτῇ ἔχει τὸ ὕδωρ, ὥστε τὸ μὲν βάθος ἔχειν τοῦ φρεάτος, τοῦ δὲ ποταμοῦ τὸ ἀεικίνητον.

⁴ Maldonatus: Loquitur de aquâ tanquam de plantâ aut semine aliquo quod jactum in terrâ nascatur.

the well and the water supply. And not only shall these waters spring up, but they shall spring up 'into everlasting life.' They shall find their own level: they shall return whither they came: coming from God, they shall go to God again.¹ There is a tacit comparison here with the waters of this world. Whatever upward impulse these may receive, it is presently spent, and they fall back to the earth again; but the water of life is borne upward by a supernatural impulse, till it reaches again that heaven from which it came.²

Olshausen and others have invited us to notice, upon these words, the contrast between this promise of Christ and another of the Son of Sirach. In a glorious passage, one of the noblest in the books not directly inspired of the Bible, Wisdom praising herself exclaims, 'They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty' (Ecclus. xxiv. 21). We are invited to note here the deep insight into the different blessings of the Old and of the New Covenant, which a comparison between the promises of the two passages affords—the blessing of the Old Covenant, the awakening of the desire, that of the New, the satisfying of this same desire; there the blessing, so to speak, on its more negative, here on its more positive, side. Now whatever truth there may be in the fact thus stated, and a relative truth there is, yet I scarcely think that we can fairly trace it here. When Christ says that he who drinks of the water which He gives 'shall never thirst,' it is surely meant that he shall never thirst for any other water save this living water which He Himself imparts.¹ He too, no less than the Wisdom of the elder Covenant, would say that for this water he shall thirst and thirst again. This, that he does so thirst again, that draughts of the waters of life breed no satiety, such as the draughts from the fountains of this world's joy so quickly bring about, that these waters kindle the thirst which they assuage, is not the infelicity of him who drinks, but his blessedness rather. No one counts that it was faring ill with David, then when he exclaimed, 'My soul is athirst for God, even for the living God.' How many, as they read, have rather yearned that they might be athirst with him, only mourn that their own thirst is so languid, while they know that there is a river of God at which this thirst may be at once stilled and quickened, stilled in all which implies a want and a discomfort, quickened in all which shall drive it to seek for ever new supplies from Him, who is the indeficient fountain of all good.² Only so could it have been said, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness' (Matt. v. 6; cf. Isai. xii. 3; xliv. 3; Ps. lxxxvii. 7).

¹ Grotius: Emphasis est in voce saliet. Solent enim aquæ salire ad altitudinem usque suæ originis.

² Lampe: Elegans hic latet oppositio inter has aquas et illas quæ ex scaturigine terrestri proliciuntur. Quotocunque enim impetu prorumpant, vix tamen ultra aliquot pedes in aërem eleuantur. Hic vero sistuntur aquæ quæ vi plane supernaturali in cælum ipsum et vitam æternam saliant.

There is a certain blind longing after this springing water awakened in the soul of this poor sinner, who had thirsted so long, who now at this time was seeking to slake her thirst at one of the muddiest pools of sensual gratification; and out of this she exclaims, 'Sir, give *me this water, that I thirst not*¹ (cf. John vi. 34), though still there is confusion and contradiction in her mind about it, for she imagines that it will exempt her from the toil of coming to draw from that well any more—‘neither come hither to draw.’

¹ Cocceius: cum eâ satietate non pugnat sitis et fames justitiæ, et spes atque inôrationis et expectatio bonorum Dei in hac vitâ et translationis in alteram.

² Thus Drusius excellently well, reconciling the words of the earlier Wisdom with the words of the later: Qui aquam sapientiæ bibit sitit et non sitit. Sitit, id est, magis magisque appetit id quod bibit. Non sitit, quia ita expletur ut alium potum non desideret.

How are we to explain the check and abrupt turn which the conversation here receives, this ‘Go call thy husband, and come hither,’ with which our Lord seems to interrupt it, just at its most interesting point? Is it, as some say, that being about to confer on her a benefit, He would not confer it on her alone; but on her and her husband together? This can hardly be—is indeed contradicted by the fact that Christ knew perfectly well about her, that her relations to him with whom she was living were not those of a wife to her husband. The words can only be taken as spoken with the intention of calling out that very answer which they did call out; of bringing her in this way to a wholesome shame. They attain the object with which they were uttered. The confession, indeed, which they elicit, ‘I have no husband,’ is only a half confession; not all the truth, and yet true as far as it goes; and for the truth’s sake which it contains He accepts and allows it: ‘Thou hast well said, I have no husband;’ with an emphasis on ‘husband,’ which is marked in the Greek by its position in the sentence, and which might have been so marked in our Version—‘Husband I have not.’ This she has ‘said well’ (cf. Matt. xv. 7; Luke xx. 39), inasmuch as she had spoken

¹ Sedulius (Carm. Pasch. 229):

Orat inexhausti tribui sibi dona fluenti,
Æternam positura sitim, quâ nemo carere
Dignus erit, Domini nisi mersus gurgite Christi.

the truth ; for a true confession is always 'well' made, however ill it may be that the making of such a confession should be required. He proceeds, with how firm and at the same time how gentle a hand, to draw her from the hiding places in which she may still have hoped to lie hid, to unroll before her the blurred and blotted scroll of her past existence : 'for thou hast had five husbands, and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband. In that saidst thou truly.' Many words, He would imply, which she had spoken had not been true, but this mournful testimony which she had thus borne against herself was true. Meyer, including in these 'five husbands' him whom she now had, and making him the last of the five, and not a sixth added to them, argues from this that 'husbands' must not be taken strictly ; but must probably include paramours, since certainly the last was such. But the argument rests on a misunderstanding. He with whom she is now living is not one of the five ; but she, falling ever deeper and deeper in degradation, is now content to go without the legal sanction to her condition which in other times she may have required. Hitherto, we may well suppose, her life had been full of manifold disorders ; the five husbands had scarcely made room for one another by death ; even in that case there must have been unseemliest hastening of nuptials, most inordinate desires, which no dealings of God could chasten or restrain. But doubtless there had been worse than this ; husbands whom she had forsaken ; or whom she had compelled by breach of wedlock to put her away (Deut. xxiv. 1, 2 ; Matt. xix. 9).¹

¹ Augustine has called this with which we are dealing a history, plena mysteriis et graviora sacramentis. Fully admitting it to be this, I yet

Whether the Lord told her more which is not recorded (ver. 29 would seem to imply as much), or so told her this as to make her understand that He knew much more, the woman feels that she had to do with one who knows all the wretched secrets of her disordered life, and out of this feeling exclaims, 'Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet;' for such intuitive knowledge as this could only be God's, or theirs to whom God should give it (1 Sam. ix. 19; 2 Kin. v. 26; vi. 12). She did not suppose, as some in modern times have supposed, that Christ had obtained the information about her from some of her neighbours; but she saw in Him a prophet, and one who by the exercise of his prophetic gift had thus been able to tell her 'all things that ever she did' (ver. 29). There is no necessity of assuming that, in the case of every one with whom the Lord came in contact during the course of his ministry, He knew every detail of his anterior find it impossible to accept the allegorical interpretation of these 'five husbands,' which Hengstenberg traces here. For him this woman is, so to speak, the representative of that Samaria out of which she comes, of its past idolatry, its present will-worship, its future conversion—her relations with her five husbands, and with him who was not her husband, having by divine Providence been so overruled as exactly to set forth the history up to that moment of her people. He refers us to 2 Kin. xvii. 24, where we find the five nations, the colluvies gentium out of which the Samaritans grew, bringing with them into their new seats each its own god, see ver. 29-31; and he further cites Josephus (Antt. ix. 14. 3): οι δὲ μετοικισθέντες εἰς τὴν Σαμαρείαν Χουδαῖοι, ἕκαστοι κατὰ ἔθνος ἰδίον θεὸν εἰς τὴν Σαμαρείαν κομίσαντες, πέντε δ' ἦσαν, καὶ τούτους, καθὼς ἦν πατέριον αὐτοῖς, σεβόμενοι. With these her idol gods Samaria lived in a real communion, but one as lightly broken off as it had been knit; while He whom now she had no legitimate husband of hers, for, 'thy Maker is thy husband,' true concerning the Jewish Church, was utterly false in respect of the Samaritan. It is certainly an ingenious suggestion, resting upon a very remarkable coincidence, but is scarcely more. When it is attempted to carry through the allegory it breaks down and that in parts essential; thus these five false gods were contemporaneous; while her five husbands had one succeeded the other; her sin had not been polyandry.

history ; but wherever this was needed for the interests of the kingdom of God, for the work of that ministry which He had come to fulfil, for the best interests of that soul which He sought to win, there through an act of his will He could by his divine Spirit unlock the past, read not merely what was now passing, but all which had ever passed in the hearts, or which had been externally wrought in the lives, of those with whom He had to do (John ii. 25 ; v. 14). It concerned the counsels of his love that He should thus know concerning this poor sinner, and therefore He knew.

Her whole tone is now changed. It was half earnest before, in that request, 'Sir, give me this water' (ver. 15) ; but it is whole earnest now ; and it is quite a missing of the real earnestness which she now feels to take her words which follow : 'Our fathers worshipped in this mount ; and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship,' as though they were intended to draw off Him with whom she was speaking from pressing home upon her those unwelcome truths about her own life,¹ by suggesting some general question, in which her people indeed might possibly have the worst ; but which yet brought home no peculiar personal shame to herself. The suggestion is ingenious, but it is much more in character with the effectual work which is being wrought, as the issue proves, in her soul, to ascribe these words to quite another motive. Hitherto she had never been really enough in earnest about the worship and service of God, to feel any misgiving or anxiety in respect of that great controversy which was so eagerly debated between her people and the Jews. And yet, if the Jews were right, what was the whole Samaritan worship but a lie; not merely a service which God had not commanded, but which was contrary to his command, with unsoundness and rottenness at its very core? She had hitherto troubled herself nothing about this; she had taken things as she found them. But the time of such indifference was past; it became all-important for her to know in which of the two channels the line of blessing indeed ran, whether salvation was of the Samaritans or of the Jews; and hence her question, or rather her statement of the point at issue, which though not put in the form of a question, is evidently presented to the Lord that He may, if possible, satisfy her mind about it.

¹ So Massillon in a striking Lent Sermon on this history : Nouvelle artifice dont elle s'avise pour détourner la question de ses mœurs, qui lui déplaît, et qui l'embarrasse, elle se jette habilement sur une question de doctrine, les contestations entre Jérusalem et Garizim.

But whom does she mean by 'our fathers,' on whom she would fain rely and lean as 'having worshipped in this mount,' on Mount Garizim, which rose up immediately before them; and given to it that consecration which her people claimed as peculiarly its own? There are two answers, and there is certainly something to be said for both. Some understand by 'our fathers' the founders of the Samaritan worship, the builders of the temple on this mountain, and they urge that, 'Our fathers worshipped,' set over against 'Ye worship,' will admit no other interpretation. They would find the exact example here of one, who walking in a vain conversation defends it as having been received by tradition from her fathers (1 Pet. i. 18). So Meyer, Alford, and others; yet I cannot so understand the words. The woman is declaring her position to a Jew, and doing what she can to maintain it as against him. But what force would it have with him to declare that from the beginning of that schism which he condemned throughout, her people had worshipped at Garizim? Take on the other hand 'our fathers' as the common fathers of Jew and Samaritan alike, at least as those whom the Samaritans claimed for 'fathers,' some, as Adam, Seth, Noah with right, others, as the later patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with no right at all; and then there is some cogency in what she alleges, if only it had been true. They worshipped here; in manifold ways they did honour to this mountain, and 'ye say that in Jerusalem,' a place never heard of till a late period of our history (2 Sam. v. 6, 7), occupied by the Canaanite to the time of David, 'is the place where men ought to worship.' She knew that there was one such place, and one only, where the Lord would manifest his presence and put his name there, and that to this place all should resort (Deut. xii. 5). They could not then both be right, Jerusalem and Garizim; nay one must be utterly wrong; but which was it? Would He, this prophet, resolve this question for her, and if she and her people were wrong, convince her that they were so?

But first, a word or two more on this assertion of hers, 'Our fathers worshipped in this mount,' in further confirmation of the interpretation which I have preferred. A modern writer, who has derived much of his information from personal intercourse with the Samaritan High Priest,¹ tells us what they now believe, what in all likelihood they believed in our Saviour's time, about Mount Garizim; the honour, dignity, and preeminence which for it they claimed. It is for them the holy mountain of the world; on its summit was the seat of Paradise; from the dust of Mount Garizim Adam was formed; and the spot is still pointed out where he reared his first altar; the place too where Seth did the same. Garazim is the Ararat of Scripture, on which the Ark rested (Gen. viii. 4); which the waters of the Flood had never overflowed; and which thus no dead thing borne by these waters had touched to defile. They point out further the exact spot on which Noah reared an altar to the Lord when the Flood has subsided (Gen. viii. 20); and the seven steps, on each of which he offered a burnt offering, which led up to it, are existing still. The altar too is to this day standing on which Abraham had bound his son, and the spot known where the ram was caught in a thicket by its horns (Gen. xxii. 13). At the summit of Garizim is Bethel, where Jacob slept and saw in a dream that wondrous ladder which reached from earth to heaven (Gen. xxviii. 12, 19). There is a good deal more of the same kind; but this is enough. That poor woman, who may have accepted all this with implicit faith, would have had warrant more than enough for her boast, 'Our fathers worshipped in this mount,' if only a small part of it had been true.

¹ Petermann, in Herzog's Encyclopædie, vol. xiii. p. 337, art. Samaria.

With a deep and solemn earnestness, such as the greatness and importance of the announcement which He was making deserved, the announcement namely of a universal religion, the Lord replied. First indeed, and as a necessary condition of this, He proclaims the passing away of every form of religion which is tied to a local centre, by anticipation condemning Mahometanism here, as a retrograde step in the spiritual history of humanity—so to make room for that faith, which should have its centre everywhere and its circumference nowhere. There was here, I say, a condemnation of every religion tied to a local centre ; for when Christ replied, 'Woman, believe Me,¹ the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father,' annulling thus such earlier precepts as that of Deut. xii. 5, 6, this 'ye' must suffer no such limitation as should restrict it to the Samaritans alone, and to this question of the woman in respect of the place where they ought to worship. The words may refer, as Meyer says, to the future conversion of the Samaritans, 'who thereby set free from the service on Garizim should not thereupon be brought to the service at Jerusalem'; but they have a much wider scope ; in this 'ye' are included all the children of men, all the nations of the earth, as one by one they shall be brought into the true fold. Christ does not indeed use the communicative 'we,' as another prophet would have done, as would have suited every other save Him who was the only-begotten of the Father ; but, excepting Himself, his words do not except any other.

The question which the woman had asked could not be resolved but in favour of Jerusalem ; yet very observable is the manner in which, before the Lord thus pronounces the claims of Garizim untenable and without a warrant, He lifts up the whole matter in debate into a higher sphere, and shows how in a little while the very subject matter of it will have disappeared altogether. That there could be such a controversy as this, whether at Jerusalem or at Garizim men ought to worship the Father, the very existence of such a dispute had its rise in the fact that even true religion itself hitherto had moved among 'elements of this world' (Gal. iv. 3), and had owned a 'worldly sanctuary' (Heb. ix. 1), from which now it was about to disengage itself for ever; and once disengaged from these, the controversy would be possible no more, but that great prophetic word of Malachi would be fulfilled, 'and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering' (Mal. i. 11).

¹ Bengel has a subtle observation here : Ad Judæos et discipulos sæpe Christus dixit, Dico vobis (ver. 35). Uno hoc loco ad Samaritida, Oredo mihi. Illi magis obligati erant ad credendum, quam hæc. Hanc proportionem sequuntur formulæ.

As concerns, indeed, the present and the past nothing can be more absolute than the decision which Christ pronounces in favour of Jerusalem and its worship, and against Garizim and the will-worship which was established there: 'Ye worship ye know not what; we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews.' This neuter 'what' has often made a difficulty; we should certainly have expected, 'Ye worship ye know not whom;' and again, 'We know whom we worship.' Some therefore have made this 'what' to express rather the manner than the object of worship. But it was more probably selected to express the unreal character of their whole worship, the absence of any relation on their part to a personal God. It will then find its exact parallel in St. Paul's use of 'the Godhead' (τὸ θεῖον) at Acts xvii. 29. God is only truly worshipped of them whom He has shewn how to worship Him, and who worship Him in the way that He has shewn. He is only known of those to whom He makes Himself known. The Samaritan was eminently an invented religion; more so in many respects than the traditional heathenism, which may have still kept traces, not wholly effaced, of the original revelation; a name without a power, a temple without a temple's God. The altar they reared was, in the saddest sense of the words,

‘To an Unknown God,’ and one whom by means of that worship they could never know. The other ‘what’ in the second clause of the sentence will then be there only for the sake of concinnity. Had the assertion stood alone, it would have been, ‘We know whom we worship.’ ‘We’—for Christ here makes common part with his people, and speaks at once in his human character, therefore as a worshipper, and in his Jewish character, therefore as a worshipper at Jerusalem and in and through the service of the temple,—‘we know what we worship, no dream and imagination of man’s own heart, but One who has appointed ways by which He may be approached, and who, sitting between the Cherubim, meets them who approach Him by these.’ A Jew might be full of darkness, many were so, in respect of the God whose name he bore, whose worshipper he professed to be; but that was his separate individual guilt, and sprang from a refusing to use, or from a not using aright, that knowledge of God to which he had been called; meanwhile every Jew, who was such in truth and not in name only, knew what and whom he worshipped. It was otherwise with the Samaritan. He did not fail in the right application of what his religion taught him of God; but that religion itself was a device of man; a vanity and a lie, no help to him in the finding of God, but a hindrance rather.

A rapid oversight of the circumstances under which the Samaritan worship came into being, and the conditions of its existence at this time, will enable us best to understand the uncompromising severity of the verdict which the lips of truth have just pronounced against it. It is true that the upgrowth of the Samaritan worship, with the building of the temple on Mount Garizim, which for two hundred years, according to Josephus, but probably for more nearly three hundred, was an offence and a provocation to those who worshipped on Mount Moriah (the rivalry of the religions has survived the destruction of both temples), is clothed in much obscurity; yet not so great as to hide from us the unreal character which clung to it from the first. To regard Samaritanism as in any sense a continuation of the schism, political and religious, of the Ten Tribes¹ is altogether misleading. It is true, as mentioned already, that the Samaritans at a later day claimed their descent from the tribe of Ephraim; in which, as they affirmed, the true line of God's promises ran, appealing in proof to Gen. xlix. 22-26; Deut. xxxiii. 13-17; and ignoring, as some tell us, Eli and Samuel and the house of David altogether. But this was an after-thought. The only real thread of connection between the two is the well-known fact recorded in the Second Book of Kings (xvii. 24-28), namely, that when the heathen colonists planted by the king of Assyria in the land left desolate by the deportation of its Israelitish inhabitants, were annoyed in their new seats by lions, these 'proselytes of the lions,' as the Jews loved insultingly to call them, sought and obtained that a priest from among those who had been thus carried away might be sent back to teach them 'the manner of the God of the land,' hoping so to avert his displeasure. But one of Jeroboam's priests, himself entangled in the idolatries of Dan and Bethel, was not likely to accomplish much, and from the sacred narrative we gather that he accomplished nothing at all, in the way of extirpating the various idolatries which the Persian and Median colonists had brought with them

¹ As Witsius does in his Decaphylon, ch. 3, and many more.

(ver. 29-41); some of these idolatries surviving in forms the most hideous (see ver. 31); however he may have managed to combine with these certain outward ceremonies, and to impart a knowledge of certain outward facts, of the true religion.

When the children of the Captivity, restored to their own land, were engaged in the rebuilding of their temple, the Samaritans, as is familiar to all, requested, not on the ground of a common nationality, for that they do not venture to plead, but as seeking the same God with them, to be allowed to share in the work; with, of course, the condition understood, that the temple, reared by both, should be common to both (Ezra iv. 1-3). The Jews refused; and they could not do otherwise. The Jewish Church might even then receive proselytes one by one into its bosom; but the time of any freer larger adoption of the nations was yet far off; and it was God, not man, who must determine when the hour for this had arrived. For the present their strength lay in their isolation. That alone could preserve them from the infinite spiritual dangers which surrounded them. Mingling with the heathen, or suffering these to mingle with them, they would soon have learned their works. The Samaritans resent the refusal; put many spiteful hindrances in the way of the work; and the seeds of an enmity which has lasted to this day, seeds hereafter to spring up in ten thousand bitternesses of hate and scorn and wrong on the one side and on the other, were sown.

There are no means of tracing the steps by which the Samaritan worship in the course of time eliminated from itself the grosser heathen elements which it contained (its kernel was heathenish to the last, see ver. 22), or the modifications which it underwent, until at last it became so plausible a counterfeit of the truth, that it did not hesitate to enter the lists even of theological argument; disputing,—it does so here by the mouth of this woman—as to which was the truth, and which the lie. But though the several steps of this transformation may be out of our power to trace, there was one event, or series of events, which must have exercised an enormous influence in bringing such a result about, which perhaps alone would have made it possible. This was the secession from Jerusalem of one or more members of the high-priestly family; accompanied or followed by that of other distinguished refugees; who for one cause or another driven from Jerusalem, or malcontents quitting it of their own accord, found refuge and welcome in Samaria, and brought a knowledge with them of the Jewish ritual and of the Jewish theology to those whose faith and worship must till their arrival have been a very poor, maimed, and ignorant thing.

Josephus¹ has a story exactly of the kind, which cannot indeed pass muster as he tells it; but which yet is generally recognized as possessing a foundation of historic truth, as the more or less inaccurate version of an event recorded thus by Nehemiah: ‘And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the High Priest, was son in law to Sanballat the Horonite; therefore I chased him from me’ (xiii. 28); or, if not this, to be another event of a like character, which in the telling has been more or less confused with this. If indeed Josephus refers to the same event as Nehemiah, then, besides other mistakes, he has placed it some eighty years after the date when it really happened. His story is of one Manasses, brother of Joiada the High Priest, who about the year B. C. 332, was chased from Jerusalem on account of a marriage which he had contracted with the daughter of Sanballat, the Persian governor of Samaria, and which, when required, he refused to dissolve. He was received with open arms by his father in law, who undertook to rear for him on Mount Garizim, the highest mountain in Samaria, a temple more magnificent than that from which he had been driven; where he should himself exercise the office of High Priest. The worship there was, in this way set on a far more formidable footing than it had before attained; not to say that the secession, once begun, was presently reinforced by other fugitives and apostates, many of them priests, who, now that a rallying point and a refuge was prepared for them, fell away as Manasses had done. Such is the story of Josephus; not without serious inaccuracies, but having also some substratum of truth. The temple thus reared was destroyed by John Hyrcanus B. C. 129;¹ but the worship continued on Mount Garizim, which by this time the Samaritans had learned to regard as the holiest mountain in the world,² some sort of edifice no doubt occupying the place of the temple which had disappeared. Nor could the imitation have been a contemptible one; else it could never have excited the intense jealousy which evidently among the Jews it did excite.³ Everything in fact may have been there,—except the presence of God. There was but one flaw, but that was a fatal one: 'Ye worship ye know not what.'

¹ Antt. xi. 7. 2, and 8. 2.

¹ Antt. XIII. 9. 1; B. J. I. 2. 6.

² Josephus (Antt. XVIII. 4. 1): Γαριζειν, ὃ ἀγνότατον αὐτοῖς ὄρων ἐπιλαμβάνει.

³ A story recorded by Josephus (Antt. XIII. 3. 4) is singularly illustrative of the fierceness with which the rival claims of Jerusalem and Garizim were debated, not on these spots merely, but wherever Jew and Samaritan encountered. Certain of the one religion and of the other at Alexandria besought Ptolemy Philometor to decide which were in the right, pledging

But if thus with them, it was very different with the Jews: 'We know what we worship' (Rom. iii. 2; Luke xvi. 29), 'for salvation is of the Jews' (Isai. ii. 3; Gen. xii. 2, 3; Zech. viii. 23; Mic. iv. 2). This 'salvation,' where we should beforehand have expected Him to be named who was the Author of that salvation, the Saviour (cf. Rom. ix. 5), this abstract for the concrete, may remind us of exactly the same language on the lips of the aged Simeon, 'for mine eyes have seen thy salvation' (τὸ σωτήριον there), uttered at a moment when he held the infant Saviour in his arms (Luke ii. 30), and of the words of the dying Jacob, 'I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord' (Gen. xlix. 18). Because salvation was thus of the Jews, therefore they knew what they worshipped,¹ and not vice versa, because they knew what they worshipped, therefore salvation was of them. He who set them to minister salvation to the world, as a necessary condition of this gave them to know Himself, whom they must first know before they could declare to others.

But this declaration of our Lord's, quite irrespective of its bearing on the controversy between the rival Churches, is very important as setting the seal of his absolute authority on the Jewish institutions as divine, directly appointed of God for the bringing of mankind to the knowledge of his Name. Wherever Christ's words are him beforehand to put to death those against whom his decision should be given. He solemnly heard their several pleadings and proofs alleged; which done, he decided, as he could not do otherwise, in favour of the Jews, slaying, according to the request and agreement made, the advocates of Garizim.

¹ So rightly Lampe: In expectatione enim hujus salutis totus cultus Mosaicus fundatus erat.

accepted as rule and law, these words of his, spoken by the well of Jacob, will vindicate for Israel in that period which went before the Incarnation a position altogether different from that of every other nation of the earth. Israel was the channel through which the salvation of God should be conveyed to the world. It was the aloe tree, in many aspects unsightly enough, but which yet should blossom at last in one 'bright consummate flower,' and having so fulfilled its mission should then wither and die.¹ Doubtless there were, as the illustrious Alexandrian teachers loved to trace, preparations for Christ going forward in the Gentile world, as well as within the limits of the Jewish Church; that had its προπαιδεία too; but in many respects this was negative rather than positive; and even where positive, it was very far from being that direct immediate discipline, nurture, and training which was their exclusive privilege, 'of whom as concerning the flesh Christ should come, who is over all, God blessed for ever' (Rom. ix. 5).

Christ has spoken already of the where men shall worship the Father, that it shall be 'neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem,' but everywhere (cf. 1 Tim. ii. 8; Zeph. iii. 11); He proceeds to speak (having disposed by way of parenthesis of the question moved by the woman), of the how: 'The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father^a in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him.' The 'now is' declares that this is a future which has already commenced. The dispensation of the Spirit, in which God the

¹ Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xvii. 11): Ipse Jesus substantia populi ejus, ex quo natura est carnis ejus.

^a Grotius: Tacite Novi Fœderis suavitatem innuit, cum Deum Patrem vocat, Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 16.

Spirit shall be spiritually worshipped is not merely something which is to be hereafter ; she stands already upon its threshold. Prophetised of long since (Jer. iii. 16 ; Hagg. ii. 7-10 ; Zeph. iii. 9 ; Isai. xlv. 23), it has now actually begun (cf. v. 25). As an immediate consequence of this, a very slight one, compared with the far more momentous which the fact involves, she shall not need to mend her present erroneous faith by betaking her to Jerusalem, instead of to Garizim. The time for this is over.

We shall best understand what this worshipping ‘in spirit and in truth’ means, if we deal with these statements one by one, only afterwards considering the relation in which they stand to one another. And first, ‘in spirit.’ St. Paul speaks of himself and those of ‘the true circumcision,’ corresponding to the ‘true worshippers’ of this passage, as worshipping ‘in the Spirit of God’ (Phil. iii. 3) ; of the Spirit helping our infirmities (Rom. viii. 26) ; St. Jude of ‘praying in the Holy Ghost’ (ver. 20) ; this being the divine element and sphere in which prayer has its rise, and in which it moves. It will follow that only there, where the mystery of the New Birth has found place, will this condition of a true worship be fulfilled. In his fallen nature man is not spirit, but flesh (Gen. vi. 3). Latent and suppressed, overlayed by the flesh, utterly unable to extricate itself from the superincumbent load, there is a spirit in him, an organ, that is, for the reception of the divine Spirit, and one which by that Spirit may be quickened into the activities of prayer and worship. Little as this neophyte in the school of Christ may have understood of all this, she will yet have gathered from that utterance of his, still more plainly from a word which is presently to follow (ver. 24), that a living God must be worshipped in a living manner, by that which is highest and best in man, and by that informed and quickened by a breath or Spirit of his own.

He adds, 'and in truth.' Where the Spirit is, there is the truth; He, as the Spirit of truth, excluding not merely all the grosser falsehoods of the heathen religions, but all subtle self-delusions in which worshippers who are not 'true' may be so easily entangled; as the service of the lips offered instead of the service of the heart (Ps. l. 16; Isai. xxix. 13; Matt. xv. 8); with all substitutions of the outward for the inward, as of bullocks and goats in place of thanksgivings and paying of vows (Ps. l. 8-11); thousands of rams and rivers of oil in lieu of justice and mercy and a humble walking with God (Mic. vi. 7, 8). Nor does the worshipping 'in truth' exclude only what is false. It excludes also what as worship is partial, rudimentary, imperfect. Those whom God enables to worship must have passed through the lower and more imperfect stages of a religious training, have left behind them types and shadows, elements of this world, have been by the Spirit introduced into the world of spiritual realities, and must now be moving and acting in it.¹ 'The law came by Moses, but grace and truth by Jesus Christ' (John i. 17). In these words, upon which the whole Epistle to the Hebrews may be said to be an extended commentary, there is a clear antithesis between the Mosaic law, with all Levitical institutions, and the 'truth.' Not antagonistic, which God forbid, they are yet distinct from one another. One has 'a shadow of good things to come,' the other

¹ Augustine: Foras ieramus, intro missi sumus. Intus age totum. Et si forte quæris aliquem locum altum, aliquem locum sanctum, intus exhibe te templum Dei. In templo vis orare, in te ora. Sed prius esto templum Dei, quia ille in templo suo exaudiet orantem.

'the very image' (εἰκὼν) 'of the things' (Heb. x. 1). The earlier may have, and has, prophetic outlines, typical preformations; 'but the body' (σῶμα=ἀληθεία here) 'is of Christ' (Col. ii. 7). What to 'worship in truth' is, this the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews has exactly declared: 'Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh; and having a High Priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water' (x. 19-22).¹

✓ 'God is a Spirit.'² Expositors have sometimes sought to go very deep into the meaning of these words, to find in them metaphysical announcements concerning the nature of God. Doubtless they are of an infinite depth; but that exquisite saying of Gregory the Great's,³ that Scripture has depths for an elephant to swim in and shallows which a lamb can wade, is capable of being pushed a little further. Oftentimes the same Scripture is at once a depth for one and a shallow for another,

¹ Keeping in mind that Christ has said elsewhere 'I am the Truth' (John xiv. 6), we shall scarcely err if to what has been said we further add—and many of the Fathers engaged in controversy with the Arians have here shown us the way,—that we have the whole mystery of the Trinity in these words declared to us, the Father to be worshipped, as He only can be worshipped, in the Spirit and the Truth. So Athanasius; Basil the Great, in a passage full of the deepest theology, De Spir. Sancto, 26; and Ambrose, De Spir. Sancto, iii. 11, 81.

² On these words see a remarkably able article by Ackermann in the Theol. Stud. und Krit. 1839, pp. 873-944, Ueber πνεῦμα, νῆξ, und Geist. It deals pp. 940-944 with this verso.

³ At least I have never traced it higher than the prefatory Epistle to his Commentary on Job: Divinus etenim sermo sicut mysteriis prudentes exercent, sic plerumque superficie simplices refovet. Quasi quidam quippe est fluvius, ut ita dixerim, planus et altus, in quo et agnus anbulet et elephas natet.

and thus is it here. We should do little honour to the Lord's skill in teaching, his adaptation of his words to the needs of his hearers, if, seeking after high things, we failed to find in these words some simple truth, such as that poor ignorant woman with whom He talked was capable of grasping, and such as at that moment she needed. 'God is a Spirit;'—we must not miss, assuredly she did not miss, the significant image on which this word (spiritus from spirare, as πνεῦμα from πνέω), reposes;¹ like the wind therefore, to which He is likened, breathing and blowing where He will, penetrating everywhere, owning no circumscriptions, tied to no place, neither to Mount Zion nor to Mount Garizim; but rather filling all space with his presence (Ps. cxxxix. 7; 1 Kin. viii. 27; Isai. lxvi. 1), in his essence and, as involved in this very title, free. On this it follows that 'they who worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth'—on all which there has been already occasion to speak.

How far, we may fitly pause for a moment to enquire, does a declaration like this of the spiritual character of all true worship exclude forms, how far does it allow them? That it has not been counted to exclude them, the practice of the Church in all ages sufficiently declares. At the same time it must be accepted as, in the first place, stamping on them a subordinate and secondary character. They may be henceforth the vehicles of devotion; they can never in the New Covenant themselves constitute devotion. Then too, secondly, it is plain that there is allowance here for only so much of these as there is a reasonable expectation can be taken up and quickened by the Spirit which is in the worshippers. So soon as ever they are in excess of this, directly they overlay the inner life, instead of setting it forth, are present for their own sakes, and not for the sake of something of which they are the bearers, directly they tempt men to stop short with them, instead of passing and pressing through them to Him who is behind them all, they are of the things which Christ intended here to exclude. The idiosyncrasies of men, of nations, of the same people at different epochs of its spiritual growth, are so various that it can never be easy to fix the exact point where what should have been a help is in danger of becoming a hindrance. So long as man even at his best estate is at once weak and sinful, it will be always an alternative of dangers. On the one side, though worshipping One who is Spirit, he is not himself all spirit; but body and spirit; and as such craves a certain body for his devotions (a 'spiritual body' it should be), cannot afford for long not to find one; the wine of devotion, having no vessels to hold it, will inevitably be spilt and lost. On the other hand, entirely lawful concessions to this just craving of the human heart may be turned into occasions of mischief. Over and over again God had need to cast a slight on his own temple-worship, its gifts and its sacrifices, when these had become not means any longer, but ends, to his people; not helps to bring them into his presence, but substitutes for that presence. And if that which was of divine appointment was itself thus liable to abuse, how much more that which is of man's devising. But it is impossible in a matter like this to do more than lay down the principle which should guide in rejecting or allowing. Nowhere will prudence, charity, mutual forbearance, be more needed than in the application of this principle; for wherever the line is drawn, it is certain that some will have to tolerate more of forms than they think desirable, and others to put up with less.

¹ It need hardly be remarked that in the Hebrew or Aramaic, which the Lord in all likelihood spoke with this woman, the identity of spirit, breath, and wind is quite as strongly marked.

Something this poor sinner understands, but not much, of what has just been said to her. He with whom she speaks has brought her into deep waters, deeper than any in which she can find a footing, transported her into a sphere of truths far larger than she can grasp. This setting aside at once and for ever of the controversy between her people and his people, as something of no future interest whatever, this setting forth to her of another Father beside that 'father Jacob,' this worship in spirit and in truth, there is that in her which dimly and obscurely responds to it all. We may take her words which follow, 'I know that Messias cometh, which is called Christ; when He is come, He will tell us all things'¹—as a cry of helplessness. 'I see not my way in this new world into which Thou hast brought me; but one is coming, the Messias, the Prophet promised to our fathers; I can only wait in confidence that He will lead us into all truth, tell us all which it most concerns us to know.' At the same time there pierces through her words, as it seems to me, a timid presage and presentiment, such as she hardly dares own, much less ventures to utter, 'Thou perhaps art He whom we look for.'

The word 'Messias' occurs only twice in the New Testament; here, and in Andrew's announcement to his brother Peter, of the Saviour whom he has found

¹ There are two curious examples of this same adjourning of perplexed and difficult questions to the decision of a prophet that should come hereafter in the Maccabæan times (1 Macc. iv. 46; xiv. 41).

(John i. 41). It is there explained by the Evangelist as 'being interpreted, The Christ,' or The Anointed; the title being drawn first from Ps. ii. 2; xix. 7 (xx. 6. E. V.); and then from Dan. ix. 25, 26. It is exceedingly difficult to say whether 'which is called Christ,' is here also an intercalation of the Evangelist, or a part of her designation of the Saviour whom she looks for. That St. John has explained 'Messias' once does not make it the least unlikely that he should explain it again; for see xi. 16; xx. 24; xxi. 2; indeed the fact that he has done so before leads me on the whole to conclude that he is doing so again, and that these words are not the woman's, though they would have fitted in very well to her speech, but the Evangelist's. As neither Psalms nor Prophets were accepted by the Samaritans, the name 'Messias' must have made its way to them from the theological schools of the Jews. With the exception of the name, there is nothing in their expectation of the Messiah which she might not have derived from that Pentateuch, which and which only, as is familiar to all, the Samaritans received. To this day they mainly ground their expectations of a Messiah on Deut. xviii. 15-19—a true foreshewing of Him; but at the same time, if taken alone, a most meagre and inadequate one, as giving no hint either of his kingly or priestly office, but of his prophetic only; even, as it will be observed, it is only prophetic functions which she ascribes to Him here.¹

It is not a little remarkable that our Lord, who so carefully concealed from the multitude of his Jewish followers the fact of His Messiahship, beyond the circle of his own disciples revealing it but to one (John ix. 31), who so strictly charged the disciples themselves that they should not make Him known (Matt. xvi. 20), sealing with the seal of absolute silence the lips of the three who had been witnesses of his Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 9; Mark ix. 9), does yet here announce Himself without reserve to this Samaritan woman, and not to her only, but to the Samaritans in general during his brief sojourn among them, so that before He quits them they confess, 'This is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world' (ver. 42). And yet the different dealing in the different circumstances is intelligible enough. One of our Lord's chief difficulties during the whole course of his ministry among his own people was to keep that ministry clear of political excitements, to avoid rousing those turbulent expectations of a change in their outer condition, which the Jewish multitude associated most closely with the coming of Messiah. Thus so soon as ever these supposed that they beheld such in Him, they sought, we are told, 'to take Him by force, and to make Him a king' (John vi. 15), to carry Him away with them and instal Him at once as King Messiah at Jerusalem—He to avoid this being obliged to conceal Himself from them; even as nothing would have so effectually marred and brought to ruin his whole work as any attempt of the kind, and this whether it were defeated at once, or crowned with a temporary success. There were other reasons, no doubt, which will help to explain why Luther's work abode, and Savonarola's came to nothing; yet this, no doubt, was a chief reason, namely that Luther's was a Church Reformation and nothing else, leaving any other to follow, as follow in its own good time it must; while that of the Italian friar would fain have been a Reformation of the Church and State in one. But the Samaritan expectation of a Messiah, if in some respects weaker and feebler, was yet mingled with far fewer disturbing elements; not to say that the acceptance of a Jewish Messiah upon their parts could arouse no worldly hopes or expectations in their hearts; nay rather must sound the death-knell of any proud hopes for their nation which they hitherto may have cherished, and caused them to bid a lasting farewell to these.¹ To them, to this woman, and afterwards to her fellow-countrymen, He could declare Himself without fear of the consequences, and He did so: 'I that speak with thee am He.'² What a glorious fulfilment this of Isai. lxxv. 1: 'I said, Behold Me, behold Me, unto a nation that was not called by my name.'

¹ The rise of at least one false Christ about this same time, or a little later, among the Samaritans—I refer in particular to Dositheus,—is evidence that Messias-hopes and expectations were stirring among them no less than among the Jews.

'And upon this, came his disciples and marvelled that He talked with the woman.'³ The oriental contempt of woman speaks out very strongly in the sayings of the Jewish Rabbis, and at this time the disciples had not

¹ Godet (Commentaire sur l'Evangile de S. Jean): Quelle contraste entre la notion du Messie telle que l'exprime cette femme [ver. 25], et les notions charnelles et de nature toute politique que Jésus rencontrait sans cesse en Israël sur ce sujet! Sans doute l'élément royal manque à la notion samaritaine du Messie. Mais combien l'absence de cet élément n'est-elle pas préférable à l'altération profonde qu'il avait subie chez les Juifs! L'idée est incomplète, mais non pas fausse; et voilà pourquoi Jésus peut se l'appliquer, et se dire ici le Christ, ce qu'il n'a fait en Israël qu'au dernier moment (xvii. 3; Matt. xxvi. 64).

² Let it be permitted to adapt to this poor bondwoman of sin, at this blessed crisis of her life, words written long before concerning another bondwoman, when grace, though far lower grace than this, was vouchsafed also to her: καὶ ἀνέψαεν ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῆς, καὶ εἶδε φρέαρ ὑδάτος ζῶντος (Gen. xxi. 19).

³ There are some beautiful remarks on Christ's relations to women, and the influence He exerted on them, in Guizot's Meditations on the Essence of Christianity, Eighth Meditation, p. 281, English translation.

themselves unlearned it. Yet while they marvelled, they were at the same time hindered by respect and awe from expressing their surprise: 'Yet no man said, What seekest Thou? or, Why talkest Thou with her?' None ventured to ask the reason of this unusual conversation (John xxi. 12). Evidently it never entered into their thoughts that what He was asking from her was her faith; that what He was talking about with her was the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth. Meanwhile the woman, availing herself of their arrival, which naturally caused a pause and break in the conversation, quits the spot—but this in the hope that she may presently return again, and not return alone.

As a sort of pledge of this her return, or perhaps rather in the forgetfulness of a great joy, 'she left her water-pot,' as apostles before her had left their nets (Matt. iv. 20); so soon has she learned to prefer the water which Christ gives to the fountain which Jacob gave; 'and went her way into the city, and saith unto the men, Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did.' Little as she could have desired at other times to direct attention to the events of a life which could ill bear any very close inspection, all shame of this kind is for the present overborne and swallowed up in feelings of wonder and of joy. This 'all things that ever I did' must, of course, be taken as the exaggeration of one still lost in amazement at that marvellous revelation of the leading outlines and so many of the mournful secrets of her past history. It is with her now as with him whom St. Paul contemplates as coming into the Christian assembly, who is there 'convinced of all, and judged of all; and thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest, and so falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth' (1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25). Such a judgment, and one still higher, she has formed of Him who had thus made manifest the secrets of her heart and life: 'Is not this the Christ?' A more accurate rendering of her question, 'Whether is this the Christ?', would not really alter the meaning; only instead of seeking to force her own conviction on those whom she addresses, she will be rather putting it to them to judge, and to draw conclusions of their own. The character of this woman, the scandals of whose life must have been sufficiently notorious, can have added no particular weight to the announcement which she now made, or to the invitations to her fellow-townsmen which she gave; yet her evident earnestness, with the strength of her own convictions lending force to her words, overbears all other considerations. They do not hesitate, but at her invitation 'they went out of the city, and came unto Him.'

In the interval between her departure and their arrival a short but deeply interesting discourse between the Lord and his disciples has found place. We know from ver. 8 that 'his disciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat.' They have prepared the food which they had bought, and now they 'prayed Him, saying, Master, eat.' But since then a higher spiritual joy has suspended all sense of a lower bodily necessity: 'I have meat to eat that ye know not of.' Let them eat; but for Himself He needs not this earthly sustenance.¹ As his thirst had been not so much after the water of Jacob's well as after her conversion who had come to draw water thence, so now his hunger is not for the food which they have prepared, but for those whom He beholds already hastening from the neighbouring city, that they may hear and receive his word. The disciples, perplexed, can only suppose that supplies have been brought Him from some quarter of which they are ignorant: 'They say one to another, Hath any man brought Him ought to eat?' He explains his meaning, and of what meat He is speaking: 'My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me'¹ (cf. Ps. xl. 8); this was the 'hidden manna' that He spake of, 'sweeter,' as the Psalmist long before had said, 'than honey and the honeycomb' (Ps. xix. 10; cxix. 103); '*and to finish*² his work.' With such zeal did He set Himself to the carrying through of this, which his Father had set Him to accomplish, that a little later He could say, 'I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do' (John xvii. 4). In these words there is involved an answer to that question of theirs, which they longed, but did not venture, to put to Him, namely, why 'He talked with the woman.' They could not now fail to understand that his conversation with her had no trivial motive, that it was for the winning of her into that kingdom of grace which his Father had sent Him into this world, and anointed Him with the Spirit, at once to declare and to found (Isai. lxi. 1-3). If any doubt existed on this point, the words which follow (ver. 35-38), difficult though in some details they are to us, would have removed it.

¹ This is no doubt the force of that ἐγὼ βρωσὼν ἔχω, in which He tacitly distinguishes Himself who needed not, from them who needed, this food.

¹ One of the Apocryphal Gospels, the Protevangelium Jacobi Minoris, c. i. supplies an interesting parallel. Joachim, the father of the Blessed Virgin, retiring to the wilderness, declares his resolve to fast there till God shall grant him his heart's desire; καὶ ἔσται μοι ἡ εὐχὴ βρῶμα καὶ πόμα.

² Lampe: Vox τελείω, a τέλος, designat non solum opus ad finem ducere, sed etiam ita, ut actu omnes illas partes et qualitates habeat, quæ ad opus illud requirebantur, atque adeo ut respondeant secundum omnes partes suæ delineationi, suoque scopo, cui est destinatum (Act. xx. 24; Jac. ii. 22; 1 Joh. ii. 5; iv. 12, 17, 18).

The passage, I have just said, is difficult—more so, as it seems to me, than is generally recognized, and almost every explanation of it is encumbered with its own embarrassments. However satisfactory an explanation may prove in one part, it is almost sure to be forced and artificial in another. There is always something unreal in the going off into general observations on the relations between the spiritual sower and the spiritual reaper. What we almost always seem to want is some explanation which shall more closely attach these verses to the events which at the moment are actually going forward, and on which these words are a commentary. The interpretation which follows appears to me to possess this recommendation. And first, the Lord reminds his disciples of some words which, no doubt, had lately fallen from their lips, as they looked out on that broad expanse of corn-land, which, as modern travellers assure us, stretches out before the eyes of one who stands, as they stood, beside Jacob's well: 'Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest?' So it may be in the harvest of nature; but in the harvest of grace there is a quicker ripening than this: 'Behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes (cf. Gen. xiii. 14, 15), and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest' (cf. Isai. xlix. 18; lx. 4). That they may understand of what harvest He is speaking, He directs their attention to the multitude already covering the space that lay between the city and the place where they stood, and who were only waiting, so to speak, to be gathered into the heavenly garners.

He proceeds to encourage his disciples to a work thus made ready to their hands, addresses to them an exhortation, the same which the prophet Joel had addressed to others long before: 'Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe' (iii. 13); but he bidding to a harvest of death, Christ to a harvest of life: 'and he that reapeth receiveth wages,—or better, receiveth a reward,'—'and gathereth fruit unto life eternal.' Here is a twofold magnifying of the spiritual reaper's office; he has his own reward, by anticipation and in part upon earth; he has it in full fruition in heaven; and, in addition to this, he ministers salvation to others; for this 'gathereth fruit unto life eternal' I cannot understand, with Hengstenberg and others, layeth up a further and heavenly reward for himself; for the 'fruit' (καρπός) is identical with the 'harvest' (θερισμός), and any interpretation which separates them brings confusion into the whole passage; cf. Matt. xiii. 30; iii. 12. His work, then, having these two promises, is neither an ill-requited nor a mean one; not ill-requited, for he receives a reward; nor mean, for his harvest is of souls, which shall be saved through Christ for ever.² But why has the Lord of the harvest thus graciously brought to this early ripeness that harvest now spread forth before their eyes? The answer follows: 'that both he that

¹ Μισθός, a word not seldom used for that 'reward' which of free grace God reserves for His servants here and hereafter, Matt. v. 12; x. 41, 42; 1 Cor. iii. 8, 14; 2 John viii.

² Juvencus in the following lines, which are a favourable specimen of his poetry, gives, as it seems to me, the right explanation (Evang. Hist. ii. 313):

Quatuor hinc menses lætæ ad primordia messis
Frugiferæ æstatis certe superesse putatis.
Erigite ergo oculos, albentes cernito campos,
Ounctaque maturam jam rura exposcere messem.
Nunc quicumque metet, pulchri mercede laboris,
Vitalique dehinc gaudebit fruge redundans,
Et sator accipiet messorum gaudia lætus.

soweth, and he that reapeth, may rejoice together.' Here the emphasis must lie on the concluding word, 'together.' Seldom indeed can this be the case. There is too often an interval, not seldom a long and dreary one, between a sowing and a reaping time. Often before the reaping time has arrived, the sower is in his grave. If both of them rejoice, yet seldom is it one and the same jubilee which they celebrate together, such as that which Christ announced that He is now about to celebrate in common with His disciples.

'And herein,'—in that which has just happened and is happening,—'is that saying true,' the proverb approves itself to be a genuine one, finding its fulfilment, as a proverb worthy of the name will do, in the actual events of life, 'One soweth and another reapeth.'¹ There is no exception in the present instance to the general law, that men enter on the labours of their predecessors. 'You,' the Lord would say, 'are about to enter upon mine.' This monition shall keep them humble, whatever successes may await them. 'You desired just now to know why I talked with the woman, what I could have been seeking from her. I was a sower then, you shall be reapers in the harvest which from that sowing has so quickly sprung up. I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed no labour.' We best understand this past, 'I sent you' (ἀπέστειλα), by supposing our Lord to travel

¹ The words in the Ajax of Sophocles, 645,

ἀλλ' ἐστ' ἀληθὴς ἡ βροτῶν παροιμία,
ἐχθρῶν δάδωρα δῶρα, κοῖνὸν ὄνησιμα,

are not exactly parallel. Ajax there affirms the proverb which he cites to contain a maxim, not false, but true, therefore ἀληθὴς: our Lord affirms this saying which He has cited to be a genuine one, to be ἀληθινός, such as deserves to pass muster, and to take its place among the recognized sayings of men.

back in thought, and to plant Himself, as He speaks, at the moment when He first gave them their commission, sent them forth as ambassadors of his grace, labourers in his harvest field.¹ 'Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours.' This plural, 'other men,' or 'others,' as it would be better rendered, must not lead us astray, as it has led so many, and induce us to refer this to the prophets and other principal labourers in the older Covenant, who underwent their hard apprenticeship under the Law (Gal. iv. 3; Acts xv. 10); as though the anti-thesis were between them and the apostles of the New. It is rather between Christ Himself and his apostles; between the Master and the servants, not between two different companies of the servants. He is the sower, they are the reapers; and as compared with his labours, theirs might be esteemed as none at all. What a glimpse have we here of the travail of his soul in the redemption of mankind—when He who certainly would not underrate what his servants wrought for Him, nor forget any labour of their love (Rev. ii. 2, 3), could yet speak in such a language as this; all this labour and all this toil of theirs quite disappearing from his sight, when brought side to side with his own.² Truly He trod the winepress alone; and of this He counts it good to remind them at the present moment, who were about to share with Him in the triumphs of the time.

'So when the Samaritans were come unto Him, they

¹ Lampe: Utitur tempore præterito, Ego misi vós, quia missio eorum a vocatione Christi incipiebat, licet deinceps complementum suum acceperit.

² We may profitably bring together, we were probably meant to bring together, the κεκοπιέκασιν of this ver. 38, and the ὁ οὖν Ἰησοῦς κεκοπιέκας of ver. 6.

besought Him that He would tarry with them. While orthodox Jews besought Him that He would depart out of their coasts (Matt. viii. 34), drove Him with violence (Luke iv. 29), or plotted to scare Him by fraud (Luke xiii. 31, 32), from among them, poor heretical Samaritans make it their petition that He would tarry with them; so have the first become last, and the last first. Nor did they make this petition in vain. Although during his earthly ministry sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, so that his personal contact with any other was exceptional, and in one way or other was noted as such, 'He abode there two days.' Assuredly these days were infinitely precious to many—He during them preparing their hearts for that glad and free acceptance of the message of the Gospel, which after his resurrection it is recorded that Philip found in 'a city of Samaria' (Acts viii. 5), it is difficult not to think in this city, the headquarters of the Samaritan worship—and, as it would seem, 'in many villages of the Samaritans' as well (ver. 25). Nor were these days of preparation only. This, as He has intimated already, was a sowing time and a reaping time all in one—the two drawn into marvellous nearness with one another. The Evangelist gives us assurance of this, informing us as He does, that 'many more believed because of his word;' and these, having believed, 'said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.' St. John loves to mark the advancing steps of faith, and how those who believe come to believe more strongly, pass on from faith to faith, from a weaker to a firmer, from a lower to a higher; compare ii. 11; xvi. 30; xx. 8. This speech of her fellow-townsmen to the woman has nothing rude or offensive¹ about it, rather, indeed, the contrary: 'We set our own seals to the truth of thy report. We have heard Him ourselves, the gracious words which He speaks, the authority with which He speaks them; He has so commended Himself to us, with such demonstration of the truth, that we bow to his claims, and, quite irrespective of any witness of thine, take Him for what He avouches Himself to be, the Christ, the Saviour of the world.'

The fact that the Scripture allows and accepts this confession of theirs, sees in it not an act of credulity but of faith, and this, notwithstanding the very slight external proofs which to them He could have produced, attesting and making good his pretensions to be the Messiah, is very instructive. It is an evidence that the Scripture ascribes to man a spiritual organ for the recognition of the highest truth, when this is presented to him; that it regards the truth,—and Christ is the Truth (John xiv. 6),—as ἀπόπυστος, visible by its own light, and carrying its own conviction with it. In all this matter the woman may be said to have fulfilled for her fellow-countrymen the office which the Church fulfils for her children. She too witnesses of Christ; and then those brought to Him through this witness find in Him such fulness of grace and truth, that they set to their own seals that He is the Christ, and have another and a better witness of this in themselves.²

¹ Some indeed have urged that λαλία, by which the Samaritans describe the report of the woman, is properly garrulous talk; thus Calvin: Videntur jactare Samaritani sibi solidius jam esse fulcrum quam in lingua mulieris, quæ ut plurimum futilis esse solet. But λαλία has no such slighting usage in Scripture; at John viii. 43 it is ascribed to Christ.

² Grotius: Notârunt veteres in hac Samaritidi Ecclesiæ esse figuram, quæ nos adducit ad verbum divinum; nos verbo, maxime propter ipsius majestatem et sanctitatem, credimus. Confer 1 Reg. x. 6, 7.

This is the only occasion on which the phrase, 'Saviour of the world,' appears in the Gospels, as only once elsewhere in the New Testament, namely, in the First Epistle of St. John (iv. 14; cf. 1 Tim. iv. 10). Remarkably enough, though when we look a little closer most naturally, it occurs first on the lips of these Samaritan converts. Such language, with the mighty truth which was bound up with it, was still a long way off from Jewish thought, had not as yet risen above the horizon in the minds of apostles themselves; for these, even after the Resurrection itself, demanded, 'Wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?' (Acts i. 6; cf. Luke i. 68-79; xxiv. 21) by their question testifying that their horizon reached no further than this, that this restoration was the ultimate limit of their hopes; even as the first half of the Book of Acts gives evidence how slowly, with how many reluctancies on the part of some, it broke upon their minds that theirs was a commission as wide as the world, that their risen Lord was not King of Israel only, but 'Saviour of the world' as well.

Many circumstances made the reception of this truth easier to Samaritans. When they had once accepted Jesus as the Messiah, there was every inducement at work in their minds to contemplate Him not so much this King of Israel, as the Saviour of the world. From his lips they no doubt had learned, as the woman who first brought them to Him had learned, that their pretensions as the seed of Abraham were utterly baseless, that only as He was this Saviour of all men could they have any part or lot in Him.¹ The Jew might cling to his exclusive prerogatives, and passionately refuse to forego them. These Samaritans were under no such temptation. Such exclusive prerogatives were not, and never had been, theirs. In their acknowledgment of a Jewish Messiah they have passed a judgment on the whole past religious history of their nation, have confessed that, which up to this moment they had so obstinately denied, that 'salvation is of the Jews;' and it only remained for them to accept that place which in the economy of this 'salvation' was assigned to them, to rejoice that, although 'of the Jews,' it was not for them alone; to welcome Him who, being first King of Israel, was also Saviour of the world.¹

¹ Calvin: Colligimus Evangelii summam intra biduum familiarius illis fuisse a Christo traditum, quam hactenus Hierosolymæ fuisset. Et Christus

salutem quam attulerat, toti mundo communem esse testatus est, quo melius intelligerent ad se quoque pertinere. Neque enim tanquam legitimos hæredes ad participandam salutis gratiam eos vocavit, sed docuit se venisse ut in Dei familiam extraneos admitteret, ac pacem afferret iis qui procul erant.

¹ Some preparations they may have found for this in the prophecy of the Shiloh, 'Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be' (Gen. xlix. 10). It is true that the Samaritans of the present day refer this to Solomon; but of old they referred it, and rightly, to the Messiah (Hengstenberg, Christologie, vol. i. p. 76. Compare three instructive sermons by Bishop Horsley, Sermons, 1829, vol. i. pp. 364-415).

4. THE SONS OF THUNDER.

Mark iii. 17.

THE mention of the new name given by the Lord to the two sons of Zebedee is one of the innumerable precious notices which we owe exclusively to St. Mark. From him alone we learn that the three foremost apostles, equal in so much else, were also equal in this, that they all obtained a new name, and that name imposed on them by the Lord Himself. Yet this new and magnificent title of 'Boanerges,' or 'sons of thunder,' with which the two sons of Zebedee were adorned, is not without its difficulties and obscurities. For, leaving out of sight those of the formation of the word, which are not inconsiderable, it must strike every thoughtful reader as remarkable, that while the name Peter, or its Aramaic equivalent Cephas, just before recorded as added by the Lord to Simon, recurs continually in the sacred narrative, is so stamped upon him as in the end almost entirely to displace the name which he bore while yet a fisher not of men but of fishes, this name, the imposition of which is related in exactly the same language and with the same emphasis, never once reappears in Scripture; 'you never find James called Boanerges, or John so called, either by themselves or by others' (Lightfoot).

Various explanations of this fact have been offered. Thus it has been ingeniously suggested that the name was, so to speak, a dual name, and belonged to the two apostles, not severally and independently one of the other. but only as a brother-pair, and in their connexion one with the other, in the same way that DioscURI belonged to Castor and Pollux, or to ZETHUS and AMPHION; which being so, the occasions of its use must have been of rarest occurrence, and with the early death of James (Acts xii. 2) must have ceased altogether, the name itself becoming, as one might say, extinct with him.¹ And yet, ingenious as this explanation must be owned to be, it is doubly at fault. Even granting that this was such a dual name, and only proper as applied to the pair, yet of such opportunities for its use quite sufficient occur in the Gospel history to prove the inadequacy of this explanation. The two make together their petition that they may have the first and foremost places in Christ's kingdom (Mark x. 37). Together they propose to call down fire on the inhospitable village² of the Samaritans (Luke ix. 54). They are named together as accompanying Peter on that night made memorable by the second miraculous draught of fishes (John xxi. 2). But besides all this, the assumption on which the explanation rests is erroneous. There may be some ambiguity in our Version. 'He surnamed them Boanerges;' but there is none in the original. Anyone turning to it will at once perceive that St. Mark distinctly implies that each of the twain, by himself and apart from the other, was by the Lord called a 'son of thunder;' that, while the Evangelist records the 'name' Peter as given to Simon, when he tells of James and John it is no longer the 'name' (ὄνομα) but the 'names' (ὀνόματα), 'sons of thunder,' which they receive; and thus no room is left for such a solution of the difficulty. But may not this difficulty be of a much simpler solution? Of no other than this, that the surname Boanerges, being common to both apostles, would not have sufficiently designated which of them was intended; and that this inconvenience may have hindered it from ever growing into an appellation; which, indeed, there was no need that it should do, having been given with quite another object and intention.

¹ So Theodoret: υἱὸς βροντῆς τὴν ξυνωρίδα τῶν ἀποστόλων ἐκάλει.

A more important question lies behind this—What was the meaning and purpose of this name? That it was intended as a name of honour was never for an instant doubted by Christian antiquity; and indeed, since all acknowledge the title given to Simon, which immediately precedes it, to have been such an honourable super-addition, it seems wholly inconceivable that there should have been another name imposed on two other of the Elect Twelve in quite a different intention and spirit. Indeed there are few interpretations of Holy Scripture more monstrous in their kind than that other supposition, namely, that the two sons of Zebedee acquired this addition, 'sons of thunder,' from the untimely and passionate request of theirs, that they might be allowed to call down fire from heaven on the inhabitants of that churlish Samaritan village (Luke ix. 54). Calmet was, I believe, the first who started this explanation,¹ at least I have not seen it traced to an earlier source, but it has found much acceptance since. Thus Tholuck, as quoted below,¹ assumes it as certain, and affirms that the name was imposed upon them 'to remind them evermore of that inner foe with whom they needed to contend.'

¹ In his Dictionnaire, 1730

But not to urge that there is nothing about thunder in that passage, nor yet at 2 Kin. i. 9-11, to the precedent of which the two apostles avowedly refer ('as Elias did'), the deriving of their name from this fault of theirs goes counter to the whole tenour and analogy of Scripture. The new name there is evermore the expressing and fixing of the new nature; it is the record of some notable achievement, some glorious confession by word or deed, through which the servant of God, who thus wins this name, has been permanently lifted up into a higher region of being than that which he moved in before (Gen. xxxii. 26; Judg. vi. 32; Acts iv. 36, 37; Matt. xvi. 18). It marks some signal epoch or crisis of his spiritual life, which with its results by aid of this new title is stamped upon him for ever (Num. xiii. 16; Gen. xvii. 5, 15). The essence then of the new name being throughout all the rest of Scripture at once the expressing and the fixing of the new nature, it is quite impossible that here it should be exactly the reverse; namely, the seizing of a transient and momentary outcoming of the old nature, and the imparting of a fixity and permanence to that. Simon's habitual firmness, not his momentary weakness, his confession, not his denial, of his Lord, was incorporated in his name, Cephas, or Peter, or the Rock; nor can we doubt that in like manner the Lord expressed at once the noblest and most characteristic features of these two apostles in this designation which he gave them. Even in the kingdoms of this world a king does not fasten on one of his noblest and most honourable captains a title which shall remind of his single defeat, but rather one which shall be the abiding record of the most glorious victories which he has won. Not Teneriffe, but the Nile, is bound up with Nelson's title. And if thus in this lower world of ours, how much more certainly in the kingdom of grace.

¹ Wir finden ein blindes natürliches Feuer bei ihm [Johannes] in jenem Zuge, der Luc. ix. 54 erzählt wird. Die hierbei bewiesene Gesinnung scheint tief aus seinem Character hervorgegangen zu sein, denn Christus legte wegen dieses Unfalls ihm und seinem Bruder den Namen βραβεργής, υιὸς βροντῆς bei, um sie immer an ihren innern Feind zu erinnern.

It is not easy to see what the motive was for abandoning the earlier exposition. It is true that we cannot link the giving of this name with any particular incident in the lives of these two, as we can the new name which Abram (Gen. xvii. 5), which Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 28), which Gideon (Jud. vi. 32), which Simon (Matt. xvi. 16-18), which Joses (Acts iv. 36), and perhaps also which Saul (Acts xiii. 7-9) acquired, with incidents in their lives. It must be allowed also that the usual conception of St. John, and of the character of his ministry, is somewhat different from that of a 'son of thunder.' And yet a little deeper insight into the matter will, I am persuaded, afford us much which will help to explain and justify the bearing of this name by his brother and by himself.¹

There can, of course, be no difficulty in regard to St. James. We have not, indeed, very much in his history accounting for and illustrating this name; but then we have not much in any shape about him; and in what we have there is nothing which does not perfectly agree with, or even confirm, we may say, its fitness. And here, indeed, when we are gathering notices which should account for their being so called, that fiery zeal of his and of his brother, who would have burnt up the village that refused the shelter of a night to their Lord, may be fitly adduced as illustrating this title, though utterly misleading when cited as explaining and justifying it. It illustrates this title, because it shews us what in these two apostles was the natural groundwork of their character; a groundwork which Christ certainly did not dissolve; but rather, calling them these 'sons of thunder,' recognized; even while by the same act He pledged Himself to purify it from whatever of earthly and carnal mingled with it, and threatened to spoil it. The very failings which on that memorable occasion the brother apostles displayed were failings of no common souls; were as luxuriant weeds, which, weeds as they were, testified for the richness of the soil out of which they sprang and its capacity for bearing the very noblest fruits. In their sense of righteousness and judgment, in their indignation against sin,—all this, indeed, displaying itself in an impatient and untimely severity, which would have consumed the sinners and the sin together, rather than the sin alone, with a saving alive of the sinners,—we see the 'sons of thunder' on their natural side, and as they would have been but for that grace, which, retaining and exalting all the good of the natural character, did at the same time transform it from human to divine, separate all the drossy elements of earth, and retain only the pure gold of heaven.

¹ Tillemont: Jésus-Christ en les appellant à l'apostolat, leur donna le surnom de Boanerges pour marquer la fermeté et la grandeur de leur foy, et parcequ'ils étoient destinés à faire éclater la majesté de Dieu dans tout l'univers, à ne pas aimer la terre, mais à la faire trembler pour la soumettre à Jésus-Christ, à ne point craindre toute la puissance des hommes, mais à se tenir toujours élevés au-dessus d'eux.

And the early martyrdom of James, the fact that he, first of the apostles, stained with his blood the persecutor's sword (Acts xii. 2), we may accept this as a further attestation that he indeed was all that his name implied. A 'son of thunder,' and as such, arousing, startling, terrifying, he may have caused the thunders of the divine displeasure against sin to be heard with a clearness and an energy which drew on him the peculiar and early hatred of the ungodly world¹—the holiness of his life lending additional weight and terror to his words—for in him, no doubt, that saying will have found its fullest application, 'Cujus vita fulgor, ejus verba tonitrua.'

And then, in respect of John, much of the embarrassment which some feel, when they would make an estimate of what in him there is to justify this title, arises from their leaving the Apocalypse out of consideration (it is singular how often this is done), and regarding St. John as if he were the author of the Gospel and Epistles alone. Certainly those who forget the Apocalypse, or adjudge its authorship to some other than St. John, must find this word of the Lord's only inadequately fulfilled in the writings which will then remain to him. For without denying that much in his Gospel too is like thunder out of a clear heaven,—the Fathers were especially fond of quoting in proof the very opening words of the Gospel,²—yet in the Apocalypse those which eminently may be called the thunder-voices make themselves to be heard, and do so with a greater loudness and distinctness than in any other book of the New Testament.¹ It need not be observed that the thunder in Scripture is no mere natural phenomenon. We do not read there that it thunders, but that God thunders.² It is there evermore regarded as the voice of God (Ps. xviii. 13; xxix. 3; lxxviii. 33; lxxvii. 18; civ. 7; Job xxvi. 14; xxxvii. 4, 5; xl. 9; 1 Sam. vii. 10, LXX.), and especially as the voice of his displeasure against the sins of men. (1 Sam. xii. 17, 18). The terror which it inspires springs from the interpretation of it which everyone unconsciously makes, from the sense which everyone has, that it is such a voice in nature, with which God is speaking, and speaking in anger, to a sinful world.³ And what book is there in Scripture so full of these voices of God as that with which the Canon is sealed? Nor certainly can it be regarded as a mere accident that, with the exception of this passage about St. John, only in his own writings is there any mention of thunder in the New Testament at all. In his Gospel,

¹ So Chrysostom (Hom. 56 in Matt.): οὕτω γὰρ ἦν σφοδρὸς καὶ βαρὺς Ἰουδαίους, ὥς καὶ τὸν Ἡρώδην ταύτην ὁρεὰν μεγίστην νομίσει χαρίσασθαι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις, εἰ ἐκείνον ἀνέλοι.

² See Suicer, Thes. s. v. βροντή.

¹ Βροντόφωνος is an epithet given in the Greek Church to St. John. The brothers received the name of 'sons of thunder,' in Theophylact's words ὡς μεγαλοκήρυκας καὶ θεολογικωτάτους. Epiphanius says of St. John: υἱὸς ὄντως βροντῆς τῇ οἰκείᾳ μεγαλοφωνίᾳ ὥστερ ἐκ τινῶν νεφελῶν τῶν τῆς σοφίας αἰνιγμάτων τὴν εἰσεβῆ ἡμῖν ἐννοίαν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἀνῆκε. See the valuable collection of passages from the Greek Fathers in Suicer, Thes. s. v. βροντή. Bengel among moderns has well expressed the same: Magnifica appellatio. Tonitru in Scripturâ et terribile et festivum quiddam est. Evangelium item inmundum terret, piis lætitiâ et fructum affert. That there is a natural fitness in such an application of βροντή, the parallel use of βροντᾶν in profane Greek attests. Pericles had the name of Ὀλύμπιος, as, like Zeus himself, lightning and thundering (ἡστραπτ', ἐβρόντα. Aristophanes, Acharn. 531; cf. Vesp. 624) over Greece. In the 'geminos, duo fulmina belli Scipiadæ,' of Virgil we have not the identical, but a closely cognate, image.

² J. Grimm, in an article, Ueber die Namen des Donners, in his Klein. Schrift. vol. ii. p. 421, has some interesting proofs of the many nations among whom the same language prevails.

³ Gregory the Great (Moral. xxix. 24): Quid enim per tonitruum nisi prædicatio superni terroris accipitur?

it is but a passing notice (xii. 29); in the Apocalypse, however, the thunders constitute a prominent part of the divine machinery and symbolism (Rev. iv. 5; vi. 1; viii. 5; x. 3, 4; xi. 19; xiv. 2; xvi. 18; xix. 6). Surely he whose ear was opened, first himself to catch, and then to give back to the Church and to the world, these thunder voices, must be allowed to have approved himself that 'son of thunder,' even to our understanding, which the Lord has named him.¹

¹ There is an able and interesting article by Gurlitt in the Theol. Stud. und Krit. 1829, pp. 715-738, on the word Boanerges, and the intention with which this name was given to the sons of Zebedee. It is more valuable, however, as containing a history of the past exegesis, than as itself arriving at any satisfactory results.

5. WISDOM JUSTIFIED OF HER CHILDREN.

Matt. xi. 16, 19; Luke vii. 31-35.

As nothing which was wrought among the children of men escaped the notice of the Lord, so nothing was so far beneath Him but that He was willing to use it for the setting forth the truths of his kingdom. Those truths had in themselves such inherent dignity and grandeur that they needed not to fear anything from being brought into this contact. We have a striking example of this, his fearless use of the common and the familiar, in that comparison with which He closes his testimony to the character and work of the Baptist: 'But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.' Here the Lord finds in the sports and altercations of boys playing in the streets that which shall serve his turn, shall set forth and illustrate the truth which He has in hand. One group of these children, in that spirit of imitation so characteristic of their age, has been acting now a marriage, and now a funeral; has been piping now, and mourning then; but in the end complains that another band, whose help they needed, and whom they would fain have drawn into their sports, as mourners at their mock funeral, if they would not be revellers at their mock marriage, have stood peevishly aloof, and refused altogether to take a share in their games: 'We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.'¹

Christ proceeds to explain why and wherein that generation were like to these to whom He has just compared them: 'For John came neither eating nor drinking' (cf. Luke i. 80; Matt. iii. 4; ix. 14); 'and they say, He hath a devil.' We should not have learned except from these words that such a taunt was addressed to the Baptist; that they said of the servant what we know that more than once they said of the Master (John vii. 20; viii. 48); at the same time it is exactly the manner of taunt which his manner of life, exaggerated, and extravagant as it must have seemed to many, was likely to provoke. 'The Son of man came eating and drinking' (cf. Matt. ix. 14; Luke xiv. 1; John ii. 1-11; xii. 2), 'and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners' (Luke vii. 39; xv. 2; xix. 7; Matt. ix. 10, 11).

Few, I think, who at all reflect on the matter, will deny that the ordinary explanation of this similitude is encumbered with not inconsiderable difficulties. This, as needs hardly to be observed, makes the children, who complain of the wayward humour of their fellows, and that they cannot draw them into any games which they suggest, to be Jesus and John; and the meaning will then be, This is a generation which it is impossible to please. No ways of God are right in its eyes. If He send a prophet, stern, severe, calling to repentance, holding aloof from sinners, a wilderness preacher, a man himself of fasts and austerities, as was John, they say he is melancholy mad; 'He hath a devil.' If He send One gracious and condescending, who mingles with all the common works, and walks in all the common ways of men, eating and drinking with them, they say, 'Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber;' with no eminent sanctity about Him. John took up a sadder strain; but the men of this generation would not fall in with it; he mourned to them, but they would not lament. Jesus took up a more joyful note; He piped to them; but neither would they consent with Him; they would not dance; but found fault with the graciousness and condescension of the One as much as with the strictness and severity of the other.

¹ Vorstius (De Adag. N. T. c. xi.): Ea verba Salvator tribuit pueris sedentibus in foro, qui ludendo imitari solent quæ a majoribus natu serio agi viderunt, et nunc nuptias celebrant, nunc funera deducunt; neque tamen quosdam qui morosiores sunt, movere possunt, ut et ipsi talibus operam navent.

All this is well put by Henry More: 'Such was the perverse and wicked ignorance of those crooked superstitionists, that true goodness in no kind of dress would please them. In John the Baptist there was that eminent severity and austerity of life accompanying an unreprouvable integrity and purity of heart, that he might, one would think, have commanded them to that which was good; but he must have a melancholy devil in him. Our Saviour came in a more pleasant and careless garb, laying aside that awful and rough severity that was in the other, intermingling Himself with all companies, taking not at all upon Him, being as other men are in everything, sin only excepted; (which manner of life as it is of more perfection than the other, as supposing more benignity of nature, and more firm radication in goodness, so fewer men are capable of it, much less unsteady and unresolved youth, who are to fly from suspected company as from the devouring plague;) yet, I say, these wretched Pharisees, as true detesters of real holiness and godliness, whatever they pretend in the shadow thereof, cannot give our Saviour a good word, but interpret his goodnature good-fellowship, or debauched company-keeping; and his serviceable intermingling Himself with all sorts of men (publicans and sinners not excepted) for their good, friendship and countenance to what is evil.’¹

Such is the common explanation; and the sense which the passage, so interpreted, renders up is a perfectly satisfactory one. The only question is, whether our Lord’s words yield themselves to it, whether there be not serious difficulties in this allotment of the several portions of the dramatic action here brought before our eyes. In the first place, Christ says, ‘This generation is like unto children;’ but, according to the received explanation as given above, it would be Jesus and John who were like the children complaining that it was impossible to chime in with the shifting moods of their fellows, and not that generation at all. Maldonatus, as is usual with him, manfully acknowledges this difficulty; but seeks to get rid of it by urging that not part must be compared with part, but the whole with the whole; and adduces as a parallel case Matt. xiii. 24: ‘The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field;’ not being, indeed, likened to him alone, but to all which follows. But the case is not exactly in point, for at any rate he, the sower, was included in that whereto the kingdom was compared; while here the perverse generation has no resemblance to the children who complain, and to whom they are likened, but only to the children that are complained of. We cannot then accept this solution. And then, further, since John's ministry preceded the Lord's, and in the interpretation (ver. 18) is the first named, we should expect to find 'We have mourned unto you,' which was St. John's work, adduced the first, and not, as both in St. Matthew and St. Luke it is, the last.

¹ On Godliness, viii. 13.

Would it not then be better to shift altogether the dramatis personæ, and, reallotting the parts, to make, as Euthymius, Stier,¹ and Alford have done, the children sitting in the markets, and now mourning and now piping, to be the Jews, the generation of which the Lord just before had spoken; and the companions of whom they complain, to be Jesus and John? The fundamental thought will still be nearly the same, although expressed in a somewhat different manner, although it will not be now any more Jesus and John who are introduced finding fault with that generation, but that generation finding fault with them. The Jews, as according to this explanation the Lord will declare, wanted John to be laxer; they would fain have had him give up his strict ascetic ways, his rigid separation from sinners, his stern summonses to repentance; and complained that he would not do so, that he would not dance to their piping (John v. 25). Christ Himself was equally, as they accounted, at fault, though in an opposite extreme. They could as little understand a prophet such as He was (Matt. ix. 11; Luke xv. 2). They mourned to Him, and He would not lament. The bridegroom and the bringer of joy, He would not change for any sadder note, that note of joy to which the Gospel that He preached was set (Luke v. 30-35), any more than John to please them would change and renounce the note of a sterner sadness to which his preaching of the law was attuned.

¹ Reden Jesu, in loco.

Each messenger and prophet of God the men of that generation desired to be something other than what he was—their distaste and disaffection extending really far deeper than to the particular manner and fashion of the one or of the other, to the severity of the one, or to the laxity, as they chose to call it, of the other—their objection being indeed to any messenger of God, in whatever guise he came. As it was then, so is it at all times. Some exclaim, ‘The Gospel is too strict, too severe; it demands too much:’ these are the finders of fault in John; while others say, ‘It is too lax, too free; it encourages sin;’ these finding fault with the Lord; the two forms of murmuring and opposition being, strange to say, found sometimes united in the same persons. The ambassadors of Christ, who have to call men alternately to fasts and festivals of the spirit, must expect from the world such a captious and hostile criticism as this; it is part of that which they have to bear. They must look for a similar indignation, that they will not at the world’s bidding be exactly the contrary of that which they were sent to be; this indignation being indeed the covert under which men escape from the summons, now to a spiritual joy, and now to a spiritual sorrow.

But while it was thus with that generation, ‘Wisdom is justified of her children.’ All did not so evade the law by pleading the Gospel, nor the Gospel by pleading the law. Some recognized in these two, and in the harmony of these two, the law being good no less than the Gospel, if only used lawfully, 'the manifold wisdom of God;' out of which He sent not a John only, nor a Christ only, but one and the other, the severe and the mild, the stern and the gracious, the preacher of the law and the preacher of grace, that so He might win men by the one or by the other, or else by handing them over from the one to the other (Gal. iii. 42; John i. 35-40).

Such seems to me the general drift and tenour of these latest words; which yet may claim to be more closely examined, presenting as they do, by the acknowledgement of all, more difficulties than one. And first, seeing that the Lord is clearing the dealings of God with men, in other words, clearing his own, why, it might be asked, does He let his own personality fall into the back ground, and affirm, not of Himself, but of Wisdom, that she 'is justified of her children?' He may seem, but He does not really do this. 'Wisdom' here is no abstract quality, no attribute of God, any more than at Luke xi. 49; but a person; even the same of whom such glorious things are spoken in the Book of Proverbs, who appears there as building her mystical house, sending forth her maidens, gathering to herself all those who are willing to hear her voice; being, indeed, no other than the Word as yet not made flesh, or rather that divine Word in all his dealings, both before the Incarnation and after, with the children of men;¹ who, being this absolute Wisdom, must have chosen wisest ways in which to deal with them, and who therefore should not have been lightly charged with waywardness and folly. This word 'Wisdom' which Christ uses here has the advantage that by aid of it He is able to include in a common justification both his own dealings and those of John, which last he would fain vindicate not less than his own.

¹ Hilary (in loc.): Ipsam se Sapientiam vocavit. Bengel: Non enim jam dicitur Filius hominis, ut versu præcedente, sed Sapientia; quarum appellationum altera convenit statui Christi conspicuo, altera omnibus temporibus (Luc. xi. 49). Porro Sapientia hoc loco dicitur, quod Ipse optime sciat quid faciendum sit, et actiones Ipsius, purissimâ accommodatione ad peccatores plenas, non debuerunt sub censuram vocari (Prov. viii. 1, 32). Grotius too much lets go that the Σοφία is herself a person, when he adduces βουλὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ (Luke vii. 30) as an absolute equivalent; though,

But 'justified of her children'—what may be the exact force of this phrase? 'To justify,' in the uniform language of the New Testament, is to recognize and declare as righteous—falsely, it may be; that not being righteous, which thus declares itself, or is declared by others, to be so (Luke x. 29; xvi. 27); or, and this is far the commoner usage, truly—the realities in the moral world corresponding with the declaration thus made about them. Thus of course is it here, where Wisdom is contemplated as on her trial, perversely accused by some, and needing therefore to be 'justified' by others.¹ When it is said that she is justified 'of her children,' these last can be no other than as many as have accepted her teaching, and now walk in her ways. It is not that we are to contemplate these as pleading her cause before the world, and so acquitting her of these unjust imputations. She needed not their advocacy, and 'babes' (Matt. xi. 25) as they were, they could thus have done little to serve her. But yet in another sense it was out of the mouths of these babes and sucklings that her praise was perfected. In the fact that there were these children of Wisdom, that she had gathered so many round her, who owned her for their spiritual mother, hereby and herein she was justified, acquitted of all those frivolous charges and all that unrighteous blame which had been heaped upon her.¹ As Jesus spake these words, He may have looked round at the little company of his disciples. These were his justification and John's; these did themselves constitute a vindication of Wisdom's ways in the face of a gainsaying world.²

this excepted, he has perfectly seized the intention of these words: ἡ σοφία hic nihil aliud est quam quod apud Lucam vii. 30, βουλὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ, sapientissimum nimirum Dei consilium Judæos et Johannis severitate et Christi comitate ad pœnitentiam revocantis, ne quid inexpertum relinqueret, atque etiam ne quid illi causari possent . . . Johannes, ut pœnitentiæ præco, ad æveritatem compositus, Christus comis ut veniæ largitor.

¹ Bengel: Sapientia justificata est; hoc est, criminatores illam ream fecere, scandalizati sunt in eâ (ver. 23), eoque rem adduxere, ut denum justificari debuerit ipsa, et justa asseri ostendique, omnes ejus actiones ad absorbendam injustitiam, justitiamque implendam comparatas esse, cum tamen sine exceptione fuisset amplectenda.

¹ So Jerome rightly, with only the fault that he limits the 'children' too exclusively to the apostles; they properly include all the converts whom either John or the Lord had made: Ego, qui sum Dei virtus et Sapientia Dei, justificatus ab apostolis, filiis meis, comprobatus sum.

² Meyer (in loc.), as it seems to me, has seized the meaning exactly: Und gerechtfertiget worden (das heisst, als die wahre Weisheit dargestellt worden) ist die Weisheit (die in Johannes und mir zur Offenbarung gekommen ist) von Seiten ihrer Kinder, das heisst, von Seiten ihrer Verehrer und Anhänger, welche eben dadurch, dass sie sich ihr angeschlossen haben und sich von ihr leiten lassen, jene Urtheile des profanum vulgus als unrichtig dargestellt und die Weisheit factisch gerechtfertiget haben. Die (factische) Bewährung ist der Weisheit von ihren Verehrern gekommen (ἀπό, nicht ἐν). There is more than one other explanation of these certainly difficult words, which I have not cared to deal with in the text, as they certainly appear to me wholly untenable. That which has found most favour I will give in Gerhard's words (Harm. Evang. 56): Divina Sapientia a filiis suis justificatur, hoc est quasi in iudicium pertrahitur, disceptatur cum ea, de jure accusatur, taxatur, reprehenditur, ut in qua nunc hoc nunc illud desideretur. Et qui debebant esse filii sapientiæ divinæ, hoc est obediens discipuli, illi sumunt sibi, quasi pro tribunali sedentes, jus vocis decisivæ, ut pro libitu suo vel pro vel contra divinam sapientiam possint pronunciare. Not to speak of other objections, this explanation rests on the ascription to the verb δικαίνω of a meaning which in Biblical Greek it never possesses. It is never there to judge and declare guilty, but always, to judge and declare righteous. The only exception to this which I know is Pa. lxiii. 13, where it means neither one nor the other, but is used as δυνάμει. Gerhard seeks to sustain his interpretation by aid of Isai. xliii. 9; 2 Kin. xv. 4; but neither passage helps him in the least.

6. THE THREE ASPIRANTS.

Matt. viii. 18-23; Luke ix. 57-62.

'THE manifold wisdom' of Christ, which shewed itself in his drawing and attaching of souls to Himself, and of which there has just been occasion to speak, must often fill us with devout admiration; but it never does this more than when there are brought before us in quick succession moral and spiritual conditions, which have much apparent similarity, and which yet are most diversely treated by Him.¹ Such we have here. There are two, or adding one of whom St. Luke alone keeps record, three, who either in their own intention or in the Lord's, are candidates for admission into the inner circle of disciples, into the circle, that is, of those who should not merely themselves receive the truth, but, as Christ's witnesses, should be actively employed in imparting the knowledge of that truth to others. The occasion which gave room for such a dealing with these souls was as follows: 'Now when Jesus saw great multitudes about Him, He gave commandment to depart unto the other side.' One of what we may call the lesser crises in his ministry here arrived. There is growing up around Him that tumult and excitement, incident on the gathering of enormous crowds, with expectations raised to the highest, which more than anything else threatened to defeat his plans, to alter, against his will, the whole character of the work which He was working; which, therefore, by all means He sought to avert or to repress (Luke xiv. 25-33; xix. 11-27); or, where this was beyond his power, to withdraw Himself from it (John vi. 15). The retirement which at such seasons served Him best He found upon the other side of the lake of Galilee; until, indeed, the eagerness of the multitude had learned to follow Him even thither (John vi. 2). Such a retreat to that other side He is about now to undertake. Who will go with Him, and thus give more explicit announcement than he may yet have had the opportunity of giving, that he casts in his lot with Christ?

¹ Augustine (Serm. 100): Obtulit se unus, ut eum sequeretur, et reprobatus est; alius non audebat, et excitatus est; tertius differebat, ut culpatus est.

First there offers himself a Scribe—‘one Scribe,’ as St. Matthew says, with, perhaps, an emphasis on the ‘one,’ to mark how unfrequent such offers were. And his words sound fairly, ‘Master, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest.’ They almost remind one of the great-hearted words of Ittai to David: ‘Surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be’ (2 Sam. xv. 21). Nor is there any reason to suppose that this aspirant to discipleship means at the time otherwise than he speaks. Yet is there not indeed in him that true devotedness to Christ, which shall lead him so to follow that Lord in this world, that in the world to come he shall follow Him whithersoever He goeth (Rev. xiv. 4).¹ These words have more in them of Peter's confident asseveration, 'Lord, I am ready to go with Thee, both unto prison and to death' (Luke xx. 33). At all events, they inspire Him, who knowing all things (John xxi. 17), 'knew what was in man' with no greater confidence than those other words hereafter should do; for with no welcome for this volunteer, but rather a repulse, He answers, 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests;¹ but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.'² In other words, 'Lookest thou for worldly commodities through the following of Me? In this thou must needs be disappointed. These cannot be my follower's portion, since they are not mine. Beasts have dens, and birds have shelters, which they may call their own; but the Son of man is homeless and et hospitia bonis omnibus reperta somniat, quum per spinas ambulandum sit Christi discipulis, et per continuas ærumnas ad crucem pergendum. Ergo quo magis festinat, eo minus paratus est. Perinde enim facit ac si in umbrâ et deliciis, sine sudore et pulvere, extra telorum jactum militare vellet.

¹ Calvin: Vult quidem hie Christum sequi, sed mollem et amoenam viam.

¹ Κατασκήνωσις is so rendered in the Versions preceding, as well as in the Authorized Version. The Vulgate in like manner has 'nidos;' but an earlier Latin version 'diversoria,' while Augustine has 'nidos' (Serm. c. 1) and 'diversoria' (Con. Faust. xxii. 48) and 'tabernacula' (Quæst. xvii. in Matt. qu. 5); these latter, with the equivalent English 'shelters,' (Chrysostom substitutes καταγυγία), are on all accounts preferable renderings. For, in the first place, birds do not retire to their nests except at one brief period of the year; and then, secondly, κατασκήνωσις has so much more naturally the more general meaning of shelters, habitations, latibula, cubilia, or, more strictly, umbracula ex ramis et frondibus arborum contexta (Corn. a Lapide), Wohnungen (de Wette), that one must needs agree with Grotius: Quin vox hæc ad arborum ramos pertineat dubitaturum non puto qui loca infra, xiii. 32; Marc. iv. 32, et Luc. xiii. 9, inspexerit. He might have added Ps. civ. 12; Dan. iv. 18, LXX. See Fischer, De Vitiis Lex. N. T. pp. 285-290; and on φωλεάς (= ρόπος, οὐ τὰ θηρία κοιμῶνται, Hesychius) see p. 287, note.

² Very curious is the turn which Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. xc., Serm. 2) gives to these words: Vulpes in te foveas habent; volucres cæli nidos in te habent; vulpes dolus est, volucres cæli superbia est . . . Potest in te habitare superbia et dolus; Christus non habet ubi in te habitet, ubi reclinet caput suum. Quia inclinatio capitæ, humilitas Christi est. Cf. Serm. c. 1.

houseless upon earth; He has not where to lay his head. It is with Him as with Jacob at his poorest estate, when, fleeing from his brother's wrath, he tarried all night at Haran, and took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillow' (Gen. xxviii. 11). Nor does this answer of Christ our Lord come out to us in all its depth of meaning, till we realize that hour when upon his cross He bowed his head, not having where to lay it, and having bowed it thus, gave up the ghost (John xix. 30).

Whether the issue was here as in the case of that rich young man (Matt. xix. 22), whether this one also withdrew, we are not informed;¹ it is most probable that he did so. But whatever was the issue, this reply of Christ was not meant any more than his reply to that other, merely and only to repel; but rather to throw back this candidate for the honours of discipleship on deeper heart-searchings; that, having made these, he might either fall off altogether, not beginning to build a tower which he could not finish, or that he might join himself to the Lord in quite another spirit from that in which he made his present offer of service (Luke xiv. 25-33).

But checking this one, the Lord incites another; for He knew there was more truth in the backwardness of him to whom He addresses Himself now than in the forwardness of that other who had just addressed Him. It was, as we learn from St. Luke, in reply to a 'Follow Me,' from the lips of Christ that this one answered, 'Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father.' In the early Church this was oftenest, if not always, understood, 'My father now lies dead; suffer me, before I attach myself to Thee, to render the last offices of piety to him.' Not a few in later times, I know none earlier than Theophylact,¹ but with him agree Grotius, Calvin, Bengel, and others, have understood it otherwise—as though his father was now in extreme old age, with one foot, as we say, in the grave; and that the request of this son was, that he might be permitted to tend and cherish his few days, that remained; being ready, when these offices of filial observance were no more required of him, to obey this bidding. But there is every reason for adhering to the earlier interpretation. It is little likely that a disciple, or one ripe for being a disciple, would at such a crisis have asked respite from service for a period so utterly uncertain as this would have been.² Moreover, a son would scarcely speak in such language of attendance on a father that yet lived. The point too of Christ's rejoinder would thus be missed: 'Let the dead bury their dead;' let the spiritually dead bury the naturally dead—which naturally dead He, designating as 'their dead,' implies to belong, and to have belonged, to the same sphere of death as those who shall now perform the last offices for them. At the same time by the former 'dead' we must rather understand those in whom the spiritual life is as yet unawakened, than urge with any emphasis their death in trespasses and sins; that must of necessity be implied, yet rather on its negative than its positive side. 'The spiritually dead, those who are not quickened as thou art with the spirit of a new life, are yet sufficient for the fulfilling of this office which would now call thee away from Me, namely, the burying of the naturally dead; they can perform it as well as thou, and, under present circumstances, thou must be contented to leave it to them.¹ When duties come into collision, sacred duties such as that which this man pleaded (and how sacred for a pious Jew they were we see from Tob. iv. 3; xiv. 10, 11; not to mention the frequent notice in the early history of the due performance of these offices by children to their parents, Gen. xxv. 9; xxxv. 29; l. 13), even these must give way to more sacred yet. Christ had said to this man, 'Follow Me;' so that now that word held good, 'Whoso loveth father or mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me.' And then, in words which we owe to St. Luke alone, Christ justifies this his withdrawing of him from attendance on the dead. He had fitness for a work which, if not directly with the living, was yet with those who were capable of being made alive: 'Go thou, and preach the kingdom of God, spread far and wide (διάγγελλε) the glad tidings of life, which as many as hear shall live.'² One of my royal priesthood (Lev. xxi. 1-12), a Nazarite of mine (Num. vi. 7), having fellowship with Me who am the Life, thy occupation is henceforth with the living, and not with the dead.¹

¹ Corn. a Lapide: Quod audiens siluit, ac spe sua frustratus, ab oculis Christi se subduxit, ut tacite hic innuit Matthæus. Tertullian (Adv. Marcion. iv. 23), besides taking this for granted, assumes further that we are to read in these words an absolute rejection of him on the Lord's part, which seems to me a mistake.

¹ Theophylact: τὸ γὰρ θάψαι ἐνταῦθα, τοῦτο σημαίνει· τὸ ἐπιμελεῖσθαι ἀφ' ὧρας, ἀχρι καὶ τῆς ταφῆς.

² Maldonatus: Verisimile non est eum quem Christus cognoscens vocabat, tam longi tamque incerti temporis inducias petivisse.

¹ Hilary: Admonetur ut meminerit quod Pater sibi vivus in cælis est . . . mortuos autem eos esse, qui extra Deum vivunt. Et ideo mutua mortuis officia relinquenda, ut mortui sepeliantur a mortuis; quia per Dei fidem vivos vivo oporteat adhærere. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xx. 6): Habent enim et animæ mortem suam in impietate et peccatis . . . ut scilicet in animâ mortui, in corpore mortuos sepelirent. Cf. De Trin. iv. 3; Serm. c. 1. Corn. a Lapide: Ludit Christus in voce mortuos. Prius enim mortuos spiritualiter, fide gratiâque Dei destitutos significat. Posterius mortuos corporaliter intelligit.

² That the antithesis is between death and life Augustine well brings out (Serm. lxii.): Docuit magister quid deberet præponere. Volebat enim eum esse vivi verbi prædicatorem ad faciendos victuros.

A third, of whom only St. Luke makes report, offers himself for discipleship, 'Lord, I will follow Thee ;'—yet this with a condition, and craving time for farewells which he fain would interpose; 'but let me first go bid them farewell who are at home at my house'—this rendering of our English Version being preferable to that which some would substitute, 'but let me first set in order the things in my house.'² But he too must learn that there is no dallying with a heavenly vocation, that when this has reached a man, no room is left him for conferring with flesh and blood (Gal. i. 16); to him too, as to the king's daughter of old, the word of that precept has come, 'Forget also thine own people and thy father's house' (Ps. xlv. 10); while his worst foes, those who will most effectually keep him back from God, may be those of his own household (Matt. x. 36, 37). The Lord therefore will give no allowance to his request, shuts out at once all dangerous delays and interludes between the offer of service and the actual undertaking of it: 'And Jesus said unto him, No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.' He who holds the plough must not look behind him; if he does, he spoils the furrow, and mars the work which he has undertaken. Remarkably enough this careless marring of the furrow has lent a word to the Latin, and through the Latin to our own language; 'delirare,' originally to deviate from the 'lira,' which is strictly the little ridge of earth thrown up by the share between the two furrows, and then the furrow itself. The discipleship of Christ is such a putting of the hand to the plough, for the breaking up of the hard soil of our own hearts, for the breaking up of the hard soil of the hearts of others. We have the same image, Luke xvii. 7; 1 Cor. ix. 10. It sets forth the laboriousness of the work better than the more usual image of sowing (Matt. xiii. 3), and, so to speak, carries us a step further back in the spiritual husbandry. But he who having put his hand to the plough, and thus begun well, shall afterwards, Christ does not say turn back, but who shall even so much as look back, in token that his heart is elsewhere than in the task before him (Gen. xix. 26; Luke xvii. 32; 2 Tim. ii. 4; Phil. iii. 14), he may still have his hand on the plough; but having fallen away in heart and affection from his work, he makes no straight furrows, he breaks not up aright any fallow ground; he 'is not fit,' or rather, is of no service and profit, 'for the kingdom of God.' Indeed, unless kept to his work as an hireling, it is likely that he will presently leave his plough in the half-drawn furrow, and be found to have exchanged toil and exposure abroad for the comforts and ease of his own hearth (Acts xiii. 13; xv. 38).

¹ Tertullian, with allusion to these two passages, one (Lev. xxi 12) forbidding the High Priest to go in to any dead body, or to defile himself for his father, the other (Num. vi. 7) extending the same prohibition to the Nazarite, goes on to say (Adv. Marc. iv. 23): Puto autem et devotioni [that is, to the Nazarite vow] et sacerdotio destinabat, quem prædicando regno Dei imbuerat.

² Ἀποτάσσεται τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκόν μου, which the Vulgate translates, renunciare his quæ [al. qui] domi sunt; but Beza better, ut valedicam iis qui sunt domus meæ; so Tertullian, suis valedicere parantem. There is required of him an ἀποτάσσεσθαι (see Luke xiv. 33) in quite another sense from that which he contemplates.

The reference to 1 Kin. xix. 19, which is generally here made, is not much to the point, except as an illustration by way of contrast. This bidding farewell to them of his house was permitted to Elisha ; being included in the feast which he makes ver. 21 ; it is refused to this disciple. The comparison of that passage with this is instructive thus far, as shewing how much more urgent is the call of the Master than of the servant ; how much less it will brook question or delay.

What if those other two, and this third whose call St. Luke has associated with theirs, were, as one has suggested, Judas Iscariot, Thomas, and Matthew ?¹ In the second and third instances the summons is so plainly to a high work in the kingdom of God (that ‘Follow Me’ of Christ ever implying as much, Matt. iv. 19 ; ix. 9 ; xix. 21 ; John i. 43), and there is altogether so marked an emphasis about these calls, that it is difficult to suppose them calls merely to discipleship. These were aspirants and candidates in their own eyes, or in their Lord’s, to a higher grade, to the apostolate itself. Indeed one of the three was a disciple already (Matt. viii. 21), whom the Lord here draws into a closer circle of service ; and if another had already set his hand to the plough (Luke ix. 62), the same might be affirmed of him. Moreover, it is very noticeable that in immediate sequence to the words thus exchanged by Christ with these three, St. Luke proceeds, ‘After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also,’ seeming thereby very distinctly to mark that what had just passed had relation to the Twelve ; at all events to exclude one and all of these now mentioned from the Seventy. But if not disciples, what else but apostles could any of them have been ? nor does the fact that St. Matthew’s chronological order is here preferable to St. Luke's take from the significancy of this hint. In St. Matthew also we note that it is very shortly after the incidents which have just been recorded, that the Twelve are definitively set apart, that the number of those whom the Lord had been gathering one by one, appears complete (x. 1). Some in the early Church were moved by these or like probabilities to suppose that in one at least of these instances we had to do with the calling of an apostle, with that namely of Philip. This Clement of Alexandria¹ takes for granted; which, however, could not be; for he was already called (John i. 43); as were Andrew and Peter (John i. 40, 41), James and John (Luke v. 1-11), and Bartholomew (=Nathanael, John i. 46-52). Three more of the apostles, the other James, Lebbaeus (=Jude), and Simon the Canaanite may have been 'brethren of the Lord'; who could not then have been identical with any of these three. If such they were, and if we have the calling of apostles here, it can be of no other than those whom I have named. At all events the conjecture has enough of psychological and other likelihood about it to be worth following up a little further.

¹ The Gnostics, as Irenæus (i. 8. 3) tells us, found in them severally the representatives of the man ἐλκός, πνευματικός, and ψυχικός.

Thus the first who offered himself was one whom the Lord evidently welcomed with no pleasure, whom He would fain have put back from Him, whose large professions inspired Him with no confidence. And how remarkable is the Lord's reply to these professions. He to whom all hearts were open, sees as with a glance in the heart of this offerer what perhaps at the moment was altogether concealed from himself. There is nothing to be gotten, He tells him, no worldly advantage to be gained, through a following of that Son of man, who is poorer even than the poorest¹—as though He already beheld in spirit the unhappy disciple, who, disappointed of his large worldly expectations, should seek to redress a little the wrong which he counted he had suffered by purloining from the common stock (John xii. 6), and should end with making merchandize of the Lord of Glory Himself.

¹ Strom. iii. 4.

But while he, making this offer of himself, is rather repelled than welcomed, the other two have, as we have seen, summonses and invitations more or less direct to attach themselves ever closer to their Lord; and if they be the two who have just been suggested, there is addressed to each the exact encouragement and reproof which he probably would have needed. 'Suffer me first to go, and bury my father.' How characteristic of the melancholic Thomas is the excuse and the hindrance which are pleaded here—of him, who at a later day, in the very presence of the Lord and Prince of life, could only express his affection to Him by those words, 'Let us also go that we may die with Him' (John xi. 16); who even after the empty tomb, and the testimony of the women and of his fellow apostles, could not disengage himself from thoughts of death and the grave, nor be persuaded to believe that the Lord had risen indeed (John xx. 24, 25). How characteristic was it of him in whose mind death was thus uppermost, that on the present occasion also the duties to the dead should seem to him to overbear those to the living. And Christ's answer and reproof exactly meets the disease and infirmity of his soul; 'Thou belongest to the new creation; not to the old world of death, but to the new world of life. Go thou and preach the kingdom of God. Disperse to others the words of that life with which thou thyself hast been quickened.'

¹ Cajetan: Spem lucri tollit hæc responsio.

And the third, who cannot obey the calling till he has bade a solemn farewell to all in his house, might very well be St. Matthew ; who, being refused this, did not therefore at this time accompany the Lord ; but to whom that Lord a little later so spake that he obeyed ; and whose farewell feast, after he had thrown in his lot with Christ, so that then there was no indecision in his asking to be permitted to make it, the Lord allowed, and Himself sanctioned and adorned with his own presence (Matt. ix. 9, 10 ; Luke v. 27, 29) ; and that, although He had disallowed it, so long as it was made the condition of obedience.

7. THE NEW PIECE ON THE OLD GARMENT, AND THE NEW WINE IN THE OLD VESSELS.

Matt. ix. 14-17; Mark ii. 18-22; Luke v. 33-39.

THE feast which Levi made, probably as a sort of leave-taking to the other publicans, now that he had found for himself a better service than that of the Roman Emperor, was very fruitful in rich and precious instruction. There was first the Saviour's answer to those who complained, not to Him, but concerning Him, that he ate with publicans and sinners (ver. 12, 13); and there was then his answer to a second remonstrance, on the part not now of the Pharisees alone, as we might conclude from St. Luke (v. 33), nor yet of John's disciples alone, as we might gather from St. Matthew (ix. 14), but a remonstrance coming from these and those, as St. Mark (ii. 18), reconciling the other two narratives, informs us. That remonstrance couched itself in these words, 'Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not?' It is with this, and the answer which this called out, that I occupy myself here.

There is something strange at first sight in finding the disciples of John associated with the disciples of the Pharisees; and making common cause with them, rather than with Him to whom their Master had borne such signal witness (John i. 29, 36; iii. 26-36); for it needs not to observe that the fault which was thus imputed to Christ's disciples, if indeed a fault, would have redounded upon Him, under whose eye and with whose encouragement they bore themselves thus. But one or two considerations will help to account for a momentary coalition of this kind. In the first place, while there was no jealousy on the Baptist's part, but the noblest absence of jealousy, at the larger successes and the transcendant dignity of the Lord, there was by no means the same entire freedom from such a passion on the part of some of his disciples;¹ and the after-history of too many of his scholars, who degenerated, as is well known, into an heretical sect which never admitted Christ as the highest, too surely testified of this. It is plain they did not look with a wholly unenvious eye at Him increasing, and John decreasing (John iii. 26-31; iv. 1). Moreover, while each true disciple of John would have held with the Lord and found himself on his side on almost every other point of difference between Him and the Pharisees, and of course in every essential, here in this external matter would be his one point of contact with them, and of a greater apparent nearness to them than to Him. And thus, without any serious forgetfulness of the instructions of their master, now probably withdrawn from them, and lying in Herod's dungeon, without any deliberate purpose of strengthening the hands of Christ's enemies,² they may have found themselves for this once, and on this single point, upon their side; and incautiously, though not meaning to embarrass Him in the least, they may have put this question at once in the Pharisees' name, and in their own: 'Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not?'

¹ Chrysostom however puts this somewhat too strongly: ζηλοτύως ἀεὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν εἶχον οἱ Ἰωάννου μαθηταί.

² Jerome (in loc.) makes a severer estimate of their fault in this question: Nec poterant discipuli Johannis non esse sub vitio, qui calumniabantur eum, quem sciebant magistri vocibus prædicatum; et jungebantur Pharissæis, quos a Johanne noverant condemnatos [Matt. iii. 7].

He answers their question with another, and with one which could hardly help causing them to remember the latest testimony which their master had borne to Him (see John iii. 29); which implied that He was well aware of the exact form which that testimony had taken: 'Can the children of the bridechamber¹ mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them?' The disciples are of course 'the children of the bridechamber;' not to be confounded with 'the friend of the bridegroom'² (John iii. 29), who is one, while they are many (Judg. xiv. 11); just as the office of the Baptist was filled by him singly and alone, being not indeed higher than the Apostolate, but distinct from it. Christ here presents Himself as 'the Bridegroom;' intending, as we may very well suppose, to remind the disciples of John that under this very aspect their own master had so recently hailed Him.³ How large an amount of the Old Testament in this single phrase does He claim for ¹ 'Children of the bridechamber' is a phrase which has been sometimes wrongly understood, but abundant parallels in the New Testament make its meaning sufficiently clear. 'The children,'—or better, 'the sons,'—where the term is used in a figurative sense, are those who stand in near and intimate relation, but at the same time, a relation of subordination to that of which they are set forth as the children. The following, I believe, are all the passages in which υἱός or υἱοί occur in this figurative sense: βασιλείας (Matt. viii. 12; xiii. 38); πονηροῦ (Matt. xiii. 38); γέννης (Matt. xxiii. 15); βροντῆς (Mark iii. 17); εἰρήνης (Luke x. 6); αἰῶνος (Luke xvi. 8; xx. 34); φωτός (Luke xvi. 8; John xii. 36); ἀναστάσεως (Luke xx. 36); ἀκυλείας (John xvii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 3); παραλήσεως (Acts iv. 36); διαβόλου (Acts xiii. 10); ἀπεθείας (Eph. ii. 2; v. 6; Col. iii. 6). The idiom is rarer in the Septuagint than one would expect, but we have there υἱός δυνάμεως (1 Kin. i. 52); ἀνομίας (Ps. lxxviii. 23); θανάτου (2 Sam. xii. 5); ἐτών (Gen. xi. 10); with perhaps one or two others.

² The paronym or 'best man' = νυμφαγωγός (Gen. xxvi. 26; Judg. xiv. 20).

³ Chrysostom: ἀναμνησκων αὐτοὺς τῶν τοῦ Ἰωάννου ῥημάτων.

Himself, and as finding its fulfilment in Him ; as the whole of the Song of Songs ; the 45th Psalm ; Hosea ii. 19, 20. How many marriages, more or less mystical there, does He claim as pointing to this, the crowning mystery of all ; as of Adam with Eve, of Isaac with Rebecca, of Joseph with the daughter of Potipherah, of Moses with the Ethiopian woman, of Boaz with Ruth, of Solomon with the princess of Egypt, of Hosea with Gomer. How much in the New Testament, only hereafter to be uttered, does He already anticipate in this significant word (Matt. xxii. 1 ; xxv. 1 ; 2 Cor. xi. 2 ; Eph. v. 23-32 ; Rev. xix. 7, 9 ; xxi. 2). He, 'the Bridegroom,' was now with them ; it was not indeed that the marriage of the Lamb was yet arrived ; that should not be till long after ; but these were his espousals ; for as such espousals the brief period of his first sojourn upon earth might be fitly regarded ; during which indeed He did but as it were salute the bride, whom hereafter, but only after a long intervening period of absence, He should lead home. He would not trouble with untimely mourning the brief gladness, so soon to disappear, of the present hour. The bridegroom was yet to 'be taken from them,'—in that phrase 'taken from them' there lies already the hint that his absence should be no voluntary withdrawing upon his part—a removal rather by violence,—and then they who were so jocund now should have both reason enough and time enough to mourn. Our Lord contemplates the whole time between his death and his second coming as a time suitable for mourning, being the time of his absence from his Church.

It might be objected to this interpretation of the words, it has been objected by Olshausen, that He was given back to his Church at the Resurrection. This is so far true, that the mourning is now a mourning of hope and not of despair; the Church mourns not for a dead, but only for an absent Lord; but still she mourns; and the measure of her love to Him will be the measure of her yearning for Him and for his return. At the same time it is true that within this period of her mourning there will be alternations of joy and sorrow; the Church will have festivals as well as fasts; she will have, that is, some periods when her sense of her Lord as taken away will be the foremost thought and most vivid feeling in her mind; she will have other periods, when she will put off for a while her garments of heaviness, and anoint herself with the oil of gladness; although only for a while, and as well knowing that she shall not put them off for ever, that everlasting joy shall not be upon her head, till her Lord has come back to her again. The note of sorrow is the keynote of the Church during all the time that her Lord is taken from her; 'then shall they fast.'

There is something of an infinite compassion, of a pitying consideration, in this the Lord's determination not to trouble, nor yet suffer to be troubled by others, this present joy—seeing as He did into the depths of time, and all the weary and painful way which was yet to be travelled over before the final and triumphant goal was won. And as this question was put to Him at a feast, and at one which He would not see troubled, so we may trace something festal and festive in the whole character of his reply; for that too has to do with a bridal feast, with garments and with wine. In festal images He clothes the justification of his disciples and of Himself.¹

¹ Bengel: Magna cum sobrietate et festivitate respondet Dominus; a vestibis et vino (quorum usus erat in convivio) parabolas decumit jucundas ad confutandam quærentium tristitiam.

The images are two, and this is the first: 'No man putteth a piece of new cloth upon an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse.' In St. Luke's report of these words of Christ, some points are more distinctly made than in St. Matthew's, and indeed the whole image, or 'parable,' as by him, and by him only, it is called, appears to a certain degree in a modified form. It there stands thus: 'No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece which was taken out of the old agreeth not with the new.' The absurdity of such a course is here more strongly marked than in St. Matthew. There it is mainly, if not entirely, the destruction of the old which so unwise a mending would entail, that is urged; but here that the new is also sacrificed, without any benefit thereby accruing to the old; a truth to be brought out yet more vividly in the perishing of the wine and the wine-skins together. In St. Matthew it is but a piece of new cloth, new, as not having yet passed under the fuller's hands, which is lost; while here a new garment is totally sacrificed, a patch cut out from it, that so this profitless experiment may be tried. The emphasis which the Lord lays on this reckless destruction of the serviceable for the sake of the unserviceable will come more plainly out when instead of, 'if otherwise, then the new maketh a rent,' we render the words as we ought, 'if otherwise, he will also tear the new;' ¹ destroy it, and that for the sake of the old, which after all is not profited thereby ; seeing that, after the patch is made, the two have no agreement together. The glaring contrast, the discord between old and new, rendering the garment such as no one would willingly put on, and therefore useless, is the point in the parable here ; not as in the earlier Evangelists, the energy with which the stronger new will inevitably tear itself clear of the weaker and worn-out old.

¹ In the Greek, εἰ δὲ μὴ γέ, καὶ τὸ καινὸν σχίζει (or better σχίσαι), which Tyndale had rightly given; 'for if he do, then breaketh he the new;' but which was rendered by Beza, who has not seldom exercised an injurious influence on our Version, Alioqui et illud novum findit vetus; making τὸ καινὸν a nominative, and supplying τὸ παλαιὸν as an accusative governed by σχίσαι.

I return to the words as recorded by St. Matthew. As making room for their true exposition and that of those other which follow, it may be needful just to notice and set aside one strange misconception of their whole meaning and intention. I refer to their's who understand by the 'piece of new cloth' which no man 'putteth upon an old garment,' as by the 'new wine' which 'no man putteth into old bottles,' the fasts and austerities of John's disciples and of the Pharisees ; which Christ would not venture as yet to impose on his own disciples, however John and the Pharisees might safely impose them upon theirs ; who were more inured and thus better able to bear them. It is marvellous to find an interpreter like Hammond content thus to explain Christ's words : 'Young novice disciples that were not yet renewed by the coming of the Spirit upon them, and so were not strong enough for such, must not presently be overwhelmed with severe precepts such as fasting, &c., lest they fall off and be discouraged.' One is tempted to ask, Were the disciples of John and of the Pharisees 'renewed by the coming of the Spirit upon them,' that they could bear what Christ's disciples could not bear. Maldonatus, an interpreter of greater exegetical talent than Hammond—indeed of the very highest, where the necessity of maintaining at all costs Roman doctrine does not warp his interpretation—is here in the same hopeless confusion. It is not to be denied that there were some in old time who had shewn them the way in this the perversest of all interpretations. Yet these, some are cited below,¹ were the exception; for the most part the early interpreters grasped rightly the meaning of Christ's words. Thus in the Greek Church very distinctly Origen, Basil the Great,² Isidore, and Cyril;³ and in the Latin Hilary,⁴ and Augustine.⁵ The last sees the highest fulfil-

¹ Thus Tertullian of course (Adv. Marc. iv. 11): Humiliter reddens rationem quod non possent jejunare filii Sponsi, quamdiu cum eis esset Sponsus, postea vero jejunaturos promittens; nec discipulos defendit, sed potius excusavit; and yet he too has implicitly given the right explanation elsewhere, when speaking of the Lord's Prayer he says (De Orat. 1): Discipulis Novi Testamenti novam orationis formam determinavit; oportebat enim in hac quoque specie novum vinum novis utribus recondi, et novam plagulam novo adsui vestimento. So too Theophylact has missed the meaning: βάκος οὖν ἀγναφον ἡ νηστεία καὶ οἶνος νέος· ἰμάτιον παλαιὸν καὶ ἀσκός, ἡ ἀσθένεια τῶν μαθητῶν. It is curious to find Beza consenting to this explanation: Istā vero utrāque similitudine significat Christus haberi humanæ infirmitatis rationem a Deo, qui non sinat nos supra vires tentari, ideoque paulatim militiæ laboribus suos assuefaciat, quod in ipsis etiam apostolis præstitit.

² The regeneration, as he rightly implies, with the daily renewal which the regeneration alone renders possible, constitutes the new vessel, capable of receiving the new wine (Hom. in Ps. xxxii.): οἱ μὲν οὖν ἀνακαινούμενοι ἡμέρᾳ καὶ ἡμέρᾳ καὶ τὸν καινὸν οἶνον ἀπὸ τῆς ἀμπέλου τῆς ἀληθινῆς χωροῦντες ἀσκοὶ εἶναι λέγονται ἐν τῷ Εὐαγγελίῳ καινοί.

³ See Cramer's Catena, in loc.

⁴ Phariseos et discipulos Johannis nova non accepturos [dicit] nisi novi fierent.

⁵ Thus Serm. cclxvii. 2: Isti ebrii sunt; musto pleni sunt. P debant, et aliquid verum dicebant. Impleti enim erant utres novo vino. Audistis cum Evangelium legeretur, Nemo mittit vinum novum in utres veteres; spiritalia non capit carnalia. Carnalitas vetustas est, gratia novitas est. Quantomque homo in melius fuerit innovatus, tanto amplius capit quod verum sapit. Elsewhere (Quæst. Evang. ii. 18) Augustine seems to me less firmly to grasp Christ's meaning; while Jerome strangely enough in the very same passage (in loc.) gives the two explanations, the wrong and the right, which indeed mutually exclude one another; first the wrong: Quod dicit [Dominus], hoc est: Donec renatus quis fuerit, et veteri homine deposito per passionem meam, novum hominem induerit, non potest severiora jejunii et continentiæ sustinere præcepta. Presently, without any consciousness that he is alto-

ment of that word concerning the new wine in the new vessels in the gifts of Pentecost; and loves to put this saying of the Lord in relation with that which was spoken by the mockers then, and yet was deepest truth. 'These men are full of new wine' (Acts ii. 13).¹

The meaning, as these are all agreed, is this; No man, that is, no man of prudence (for the very consequence which He indicates as sometimes following, shews that some men do make and have made this mistake), seeks to piece out an old garment with a new patch; but when the garment is indeed worn-out (for 'old' here can mean nothing short of this), he perceives that it would be no true economy to endeavour with a new piece which would not match with the faded and threadbare old, and which moreover that worn-out texture would not have strength to retain, to fit it for use again. On the contrary, if poverty do not hinder (for this is tacitly understood), he puts on a garment new altogether, and in this presents himself at the bridal feast. They proceed to explain, that as such an ancient garment, the great Author of all the economies in the Church of God would here characterize that elder economy, given by the hand of Moses; whereof these obligatory fasts, which men were gether changing his ground, he passes on to the right: Veteres utres debemus intelligere Scribas et Pharissæos. Plagula vestimenti novi et vinum novum, præcepta Evangelica sentienda, quæ non possunt sustinere Judæi, ne major scissura fiat. Tale quid et Galatæ facere cupiebant, ut cum Evangelio Legis præcepta miscerent, et in utribus veteribus mitterent vinum novum.

¹ Serm. xxvi. : Utres novos utres veteres mirabantur; et calumniando non innovabantur, nec implebantur. Serm. cclxvii. : *Utres novi erant; vinum novum de cælo expectabatur, et venit; jam enim fuerat magnus ille Botrus calcatus et glorificatus. So too in one of Adam of St. Victor's magnificent Pentecostal hymns (see my Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 192):*

*Utres novi, non vetusti,
Sunt capaces novi musti.*

now seeking to thrust on his disciples, formed an integral part, and of the entire of which they stand as the sign and the symbol here. This likening of that elder dispensation to such a worn-out garment may seem harshly spoken; yet the language is not stronger than that which St. Paul uses, Gal. iv. 3, 9; nor than that employed in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. vii. 18), where the apostle speaks of the disannulling of the commandment which went before 'for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.' 'It would profit nothing,' Christ would here say, 'to seek to attach my new as a supplementary patch to that old of yours. They would not hold together. My doctrine is something different from that which you would have it; something more than a mere supplement to yours, to make that good, where it is defective; to repair that, where it is out-worn. It is something which is all of a piece, not a righteousness of works, eked out and patched here and there with the righteousness of faith, but from head to foot a new garment for souls.' It was exactly such a piece of patchwork as this, which the Galatians actually attempted, and for which St. Paul chides them so earnestly (Gal. iii. 2, and throughout).

And then, as that first comparison had chiefly to do with things, the other which follows, namely of the wine and the bottles, has chiefly to do with persons; as that with doctrine, something therefore more external, even as a garment is worn on the outside of the body, this with life, that which is more inward, as wine is inwardly received.¹ For we must not regard this as a mere saying over again what Christ had said already. Our Lord often repeats Himself (thus Matt. xiii. 31, 32 compared with ver. 33; and again ver. 44 with ver. 45, 46; or Luke xiv. 28-30 compared with ver. 31, 32; or xv. 4-7 with ver. 8-10), but never merely repeats Himself; it is the same, but in some novel point of view, in some deeper aspect. Still keeping close to the bridal feast, and to the images which it suggests, He goes on to say, 'Neither do men put new wine into old bottles, else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish (cf. Job xxxii. 19); *but they put new wine into new bottles,*¹ and both are preserved.' No prudent man, who means to keep his wine for the feast, pours it new, and not as yet having worked off its fermenting strength, into skins old, and therefore weak and stiff, and possessing no power to expand. If the new piece of cloth was the new doctrine, which Christ refused to make merely supplementary to the old, the new wine, as was just remarked, will be the new life, which they only can contain, who are willing to become new vessels—'willing to become,' I have said; for spiritual things in this differ from things natural, that all are old vessels at the first, a Paul as much as a Caiaphas; only among these old vessels, some are willing to be made new, and thus continent of the new life; while others not only are old, but are determined to remain in their oldness, even after the renewing powers have been brought nigh them, and offered to them for their acceptance; Osheas that will not be Joshuas, Jacobs that will not be Israels, and Simons that will not become Peters. In the words, 'new bottles,' we have in fact a hint at the mystery of regeneration; and this language He only had a right to use who had power to say also, 'Behold, I make all things new' (Rev. xxi. 5). There was a restricted sense, indeed, in which Christ's apostles were 'new vessels,' 'new¹ cloth,' even when He took them. They were far newer, at least, than those who had grown old in their frauds and hypocrisies, the Pharisees and their adherents.

¹ Bede: Vino siquidem intus reficimur, veste autem foris tegimur.

¹ Νέον οἶνον and καινοὺς ἀσκούς; but both of necessity translated 'new' in our Version. Yet the variation in the original is instructive, as helping us to seize the distinction between the words. The wine is νέος,—what our ancestors called stump, or wine of the present year,—in which the process of fermentation has not yet taken place; the bottles or skins (see the Dict. of the Bible, art. Bottle), are καινοί, 'new' in the sense of unused, such as have not through wear and tear lost at once their strength and power of expansion. See my Synonyms of the New Testament, § 60.

There is another point in which this second comparison is in advance of the first. In that, namely, of the piece of cloth, the new holds itself passive in regard of the old; we can hardly, that is, attribute to it the power of itself actually tearing out from the old, however such a rent might and would follow on the attempt to combine the one with the other. But in this second comparison the new wine puts forth an active power for the bursting of the old vessels.² Here a new aspect of the truth is presented to us, namely, the perilous power which mighty truths of God exert, when they are received by men who are not thoroughly renewed and transformed by them, who remain old men still;—the imminent danger of the truth, so far as these men are concerned, being utterly lost, like wine spilt on the ground; and the men themselves, like the bursten vessels, perishing with it. What a key have we here to Peasants' Wars, Anabaptist and other anti-nomian excesses in old times and in new! On how many a saddest page in the history of the Church, in the history too of innumerable lives that have made utter shipwreck of themselves, do these words throw light.¹

¹ A hint of this may lie in the ἀναργος of St. Matthew and St. Mark; which our Translators have rendered 'new,' but have suggested 'raw or unwrought'—'undressed' would be still better—in the margin. Bengel gives the true intention of the word: Discipulos rudes, novos et integros, nullâ peculiari disciplinâ imbutos, sumsit Jesus.

² Gregory the Great (Mor. xxiii. 11): Quia sancti Spiritûs fervor non solum veteri sed etiam novâ vitâ vix capitur.

Keeping in mind the mournful comment upon these words which the Church's history has thus so abundantly

¹ An article in the Zeitschrift für Lutherische Theologie und Kirche, 1866, pp. 240-251, with the title, Eine religiöses Bewegung in Finnland, supplies as mournful a commentary on these words as could well be found. It is the miserable record of a religious awakening among the poor neglected Lapps and Finns some twenty years ago—which, for want of wise guidance being allowed to become merely subjective, and to divorce itself altogether from the Word of God as its rule, and from the order of the Church as explaining that rule, ended in blasphemous excesses which remind one of nothing so much as the frightful extravagancies of the Brethren of the Free Spirit in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (see Gieseler, Kirch. Gesch. vol. 11. pt. ii. p. 629). It is indeed startling, and at the same time wonderfully instructive as shewing the fixed and narrow limits within which error moves, to meet not merely the speculations, but not seldom the very phrases of those licentious pantheists, reproducing themselves among the rude and ignorant children of the North. A faithful Swedish pastor who sought, but when matters were beyond remedy, to bring back these unhappy people to the Word and the Testimony, sets down in his Diary their retorts of a single day to his godly warnings. I omit a part, and the rest I prefer to leave in his own language: Um Gott fürchten zu müssen, muss man sündigen; wir sündigen nicht, denn wer den Geist hat, braucht nicht zu sündigen; wir fürchten daher auch Gott nicht. Wir sind die Glieder Gottes, welche Gott nicht strafen kann; denn Er kann seine eigenen Glieder weder strafen noch verdammen. Wir sind gestorben, und können nicht sterben. Wir haben nicht leibliche, sondern geistliche Glieder. Wir sind auf der neuen Erde wohnhaft; wir sind geistlich, heilig, gerecht. Wir sind die Bibel, das neue Testament, der Sinai. Unser Leib ist das Gesetz; daher haben wir auch das Recht zu urtheilen und zu verdammen. Wir sind Gott der Vater, Gott der Sohn, und Gott der heilige Geist. Der Sohn hat seine Macht, die jetzt bei uns wohnt, verloren. Der Geist in uns hat die Macht zu tödten. Der Pfarrer, der nicht längnet dass er Fleisch hat, ist sterblich und gehört dem Teufel. Wir können das Innere aller Menschen durchschauen, und wie Christus sagte, Hebe dich weg von mir, Satan, so haben wir auch das Recht euch Teufel zu nennen, und mit euch als solchen zu verkehren. Ihr lügt, wenn ihr sagt, 'Vater Unser, der du bist im Himmel!' Ihr solltet sagen, 'Vater Unser, der du bist in der Hölle,' denn so lange ihr unbekehrt seid, so ist der Teufel euer Vater. Die Kinder sollen ihren Eltern fluchen, damit der Fluch auf diese Weise sich rückwärtz zu unseren Stammeltern verpflanzen könne—with not a little more to the same effect supplied, we may more fully understand that gracious unwillingness on the Lord's part to put the old vessels to this trial, lest they should burst and perish in the process of the new wine's fermentation. His words involve, as I cannot but believe, a recognition that even those whose service is not the highest, may yet be allowed by Him, that many lower forms of service besides the service in the freedom of the Spirit will yet find merciful acceptance with God. • Many an earnest Pharisee, many a rigid disciple of John, many an elder brother of the parable, if only he has been true to the light which he had, and has not had the more excellent way offered to him, and deliberately refused that, shall not be rejected nor cast out.

I will only observe, before leaving these words, that in them are condemned as hopeless, declared to be bound over to inevitable failure, not this attempt only, but all attempts to combine into one scheme and system heterogeneous materials, having no true affinity with one another. They refuse to coalesce; one proves too strong for the other. It has been often tried. There is such evident power and vitality in the great Christian ideas, that even those who have refused to accept Christianity as a whole have continually sought to borrow from it in part; to deck their own, which they will not renounce, with shreds and patches derived from it; to quicken with sparks from a higher source systems from which all proper life, if ever they had such, has long since departed. When the Neo-Platonists of the second and third centuries sought to give a new currency to the myths of an effete heathenism, by making them the vehicles of Christian ideas, of truths which would never have stirred in the thoughts of men, if Christ had not lived and taught and died, this was at once a sewing of the new patch upon the old garment with which it did not agree, and a pouring of the new wine into the old vessels which were quite incapable of containing it. The same results have in every case followed. As in the material world only substances which have affinity to one another will chemically unite, so the truth has ever attested itself to be the truth by refusing to combine with anything except itself.

But having thus justified Himself, and in Himself his disciples also, the Lord concludes in words which only St. Luke has preserved for us, 'No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new : for he saith, The old is better.' He graciously proceeds, that is, to make excuse for the disciples of John (He would scarcely have thought it necessary to make one, if the Pharisees had been the only ones offended); explains how it came to pass that these took the offence that they did, could not at once find themselves in his doctrine and life. He throws his shield over them, lest his disciples, being delivered from the assault, should themselves be tempted to become assailants in their turn, and to manifest impatience with all who failed to recognize and accept at once and without hesitation their Lord's word and doctrine as the highest and the best. He will check any such intolerance and impatience on their parts. Was it to be expected that their own, to which these had been accustomed so long, should grow out of favour with them on the instant, even though He offered to them something better in its room? If the new wine did taste somewhat harsh and rough to their palates at the beginning, this was only in the natural and necessary order of things; no man used to the old straightway desireth the new, even though it be of a much higher quality. But let them have time and opportunity little by little to wean themselves from that old, and doubtless there would be found among them those who would grow into liking of this new, which indeed in a higher sense is the oldest of all (Gal. iii. 17; 1 John ii. 7, 8).¹

Wonderful, and rare as it is wonderful, is the spirit of mildness and of toleration for all which is not absolutely sinful, so that it shall be allowed to endure till it drop away of itself, which speaks out in these words. St. Paul entered into his Master's spirit, and acted in practical conformity with it, when he would do nothing to force the Jewish converts to forsake their ceremonial law, earnestly as he must have desired to see this serious obstacle to an entire fusion of the Jewish and Gentile Churches, this perilous thing, liable to so much abuse, removed out of the way; but was content to wait patiently till it should fall off of itself—as a husk falls off, when the fruit which it has protected so long, is at length fully formed. Reverence for that which has been consecrated by time, with an acknowledgement of the mighty force which custom and habit exercise on the spirits of men, and at the same time a warning to the disciples not to overlook this in their impatient expectation that all men, whatever their past training and discipline may have been, should accept and embrace a more excellent way on the very first moment that it is presented to them, all this utters itself in these gracious words.

¹ Bengel: Paulatim mutantur habitus animorum.

8. THE TRANSFIGURATION.

Matt. xvii. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-36.

THERE has been no little debate and difference of opinion on the relation in which the Transfiguration stands to the words of Christ which went immediately before, 'Verily, I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom,' or, 'till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power' (Mark); or 'till they see the kingdom of God' (Luke). The point in debate has been this—namely, how far the Transfiguration is to be itself regarded as a fulfilment of these words; whether that was a coming of the Son of man in his kingdom, a coming of the kingdom of God with power; and, if accepted as such, in what sense it was such a coming. That the coming of which Christ here speaks is not the coming of the Son of man to judge the world, of which a little while before He spoke (ver. 27), is evident; for He has said that there are those present who shall live to see it; that it shall fall within the lifetime of some of that generation who are the Lord's immediate hearers. To this coming, then, at the end of the world to judge the world He cannot refer.

But are we therefore compelled to find in the Transfiguration the fulfilment of his statement, that some standing there should not taste of death till they had seen Him coming in his kingdom? I cannot believe that we are. There seem to me, indeed, two most serious objections to our doing so. The first is this. Mighty event as the Transfiguration doubtless was, and it stands between the Temptation in the wilderness, and the Agony in the garden, as the culminating point in our Lord's ministry upon earth, still the transient glory of it, even granting its unutterable significance for Himself and for the Church of all times, fails to satisfy and exhaust language so vast as this, 'the Son of man coming in his kingdom, the kingdom of God coming with power.' Great as is the Transfiguration, it is hardly great enough for such words as these. But, further than this, it seems impossible to think that our Lord can have used such language of an event removed from the moment at which He utters it by no more than the interval of a week. This is excellently put by Bishop Horsley,¹ little favour as his own explanation of the passage deserves to obtain: 'If the time described as that when the Son of man should be seen coming in his kingdom be understood to have been the time of the Transfiguration, what will be the amount of the solemn asseveration in the text? Nothing more than this—that in the numerous assembly to which our Lord was speaking, composed, perhaps, of persons of all ages, there were some,—the expressions certainly intimate no great number,—but some few of this great multitude there were, who were not to die within a week; for so much was the utmost interval of time between this discourse and the Transfiguration. Our Lord and Master was not accustomed to amuse his followers with any such nugatory predictions. The like argument sets aside another interpretation, in which our Lord's ascension and the mission of the Holy Ghost are considered as the "coming in his kingdom" intended in the text. Of what importance was it to tell a numerous assembly (for it was not to the disciples in particular, but to the whole multitude, as we learn from St. Mark, that this discourse was addressed)—to what purpose, I say, could it be, to tell them that there were some among them who were destined to live half a year ?

¹ Sermons, vol i. p. 39.

For myself, I can find no satisfactory explanation of this prediction except such a one as shall recognize its fulfilment in that mightiest judgment act of the Son of man, which the world has yet seen, which, so far as we can understand, it will ever see, until his final coming as the Judge of quick and dead. I refer to that tremendous catastrophe, the destruction of Jerusalem,—when, indeed, that old Jewish economy passed away with a great noise ; and, extricated from that wreck and ruin, there emerged what it is not too much to call a new earth and a new heaven ; when the things shaken were removed to the end that Christ's saints might receive a kingdom which could not be moved. This event, when the Lord spake, was some forty years distant, or more. To men of full age it was not then a mere nugatory prediction, that they should live to see this event, at once so terrible and so magnificent, the close of one æon, and the commencement of another ; divided from them, as it was, by so many years ; even as these words of Christ compel us to believe that, if only for one apostle, yet for more than one of the disciples then standing there, it was fulfilled. The passage will thus be brought into instructive relation to other Scriptures, on which it will throw, and from which it will receive, light. For example, what other explanation can that announcement, 'Verily, I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all be fulfilled' (Matt. xxiv. 34), obtain? A consummation of all things, not, indeed, the final and exhaustive one, in some sort only a rehearsal of that, it is here declared should find place before that whole generation in whose hearing the Lord spake, should have died. Again, when speaking concerning John, the Lord says to Peter, 'If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?' (John xxi. 22), this 'till I come' cannot be interpreted of the final coming; for an 'If I will,' spoken by those lips, is very much more than a mere expression of power, that He could keep John in life if He chose. The words must be accepted as expressing not merely what He could do, but what He intended to do. It is clear, however, that He did not intend this disciple whom He loved, to tarry till his final coming; for, not to say that there would have been something monstrous in a life protracted so, we know the place and date of his death. It follows that his 'till I come' must receive another interpretation, and that can be no other than one which will put that statement into closest connexion with this wherewith we are dealing now. Let me observe, before leaving this subject, that, accepting the judgment on the Jewish Church as a coming of the Lord,¹ all difficulty in respect of such passages as Jam. v. 8, 9, will at once be removed. Yet a little while, St. James reminds them to whom he writes, and the tyrannous oppression which they endure from Jewish adversaries will have for ever passed away; yet a little while, and Christ will have sent his armies, Himself their invisible Captain, and destroyed the city of those murderers, and delivered his own from their tyranny for ever.¹

¹ Hammond has more than one able note upholding this interpretation, thus here, and on Matt. xxiv. 3.

But is there then, it may be asked, no real connexion whatever between these words of Christ, and the Transfiguration, which in all three of the synoptic Gospels is brought into such close and significant juxtaposition with it, which all three are so careful to declare to have followed on the seventh day succeeding? A most real connexion—the Transfiguration was a prelude and a pledge of that which should be hereafter. In that it was clearly shown that He spoke not at random, who spoke of his kingdom. It was shown that He had a kingdom to come in; a glory ready at any moment to burst forth, however for the moment it might be covered and concealed from the eyes of men, from the eyes even of those who were in closest communion with Him. The Transfiguration is an earnest in hand of a glory hereafter to be revealed.

¹ It must be freely owned that nearly all the early expositors, the Fathers and medieval interpreters, find in the glory of the Transfiguration that which for them satisfies and fulfils the prediction that has just gone before, 'There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' At the same time, when their statements are closely examined, it will be found that in almost every instance they have felt themselves obliged to moderate and temper these, so that the Transfiguration shall in fact be rather a prelude and prophecy of the coming in glory than the very coming itself. I quote a few passages in proof. And first one or two from the Greek Fathers. Thus Basil the Great (Hom. in Ps. 44): εἶδον δὲ αὐτοῦ τὸ κάλλος Πέτρος καὶ οἱ υἱοὶ τῆς βροντῆς ἐν τῷ ὄρει, καὶ τὰ προσώμια τῆς ἐνδόξου αὐτοῦ παρουσίας ὀφθαλμοῖς λαβεῖν κατηξιώθησαν. Theodoret (Ep. 145), having spoken of the glories of our Lord's person and vestment, goes on: εἰδὼς δὲ διὰ τούτων τῆς δευτέρας ἐπιφανείας τὸν ἑρῶπον. So too the Latin Fathers. Thus Augustine (Exp. Ep. ad Gal. c. ii.): Ipsis tribus se in monte Dominus ostendit in significatione regni sui, cum ante sex dies dixisset, Sunt hic quidam, &c. And Leo the Great (Serm. 94): In regno suo, id est, in regni claritate. Anselm (Hom. 4): Venientem in regno suo viderunt eum discipuli sui, qui in eâ claritate viderunt fulgentem in monte, in quâ peracto iudicio ab omnibus sanctis in regno suo videbitur. And in the modern Roman Catholic Church, Maldonatus: Christus Transfigurationem regnum suum vocat, non quia proprie regnum, sed quia futuri regni imago erat. . . Illud ipsum regnum tres illi apostoli non in ipso sed in figurâ, non præsens, sed per transennam ostensum viderunt.

But while the relation in which the Transfiguration stands, and on which the Evangelists lay so marked an emphasis, to that memorable prediction of the Lord's, is worthy of our exactest study, it is not less important to observe another connexion in which it stands, and in which they are all careful to place it, namely, with the first distinct announcement which the Saviour has made to his disciples, of his sufferings, rejection, and death (Matt. xvi. 21; Mark ix. 31; Luke ix. 22), an announcement which had so greatly startled, surprized, and dejected them. For indeed this connexion supplies us with a very weighty hint for the right understanding of this solemn scene, and of the ends which it was meant to serve, as a confirmation of their faith, and as helping them to confirm the faith of others. How deep and lasting an impression it had made on them we best gather from the fact that more than thirty years after, St. Peter refers to it as an evidence to himself, an evidence therefore to all who received his word, that in declaring to them 'the power and coming of the Lord Jesus Christ,' he had not followed cunningly devised fables (2 Pet. i. 15-19). To them who had just heard of the sufferings of Christ there was here vouchsafed a prophetic glimpse into the glory which should follow, that in the strength of this they might not be troubled nor offended at the prospect of these sufferings now, nor at the sufferings themselves which presently should arrive. Nor may we regard it merely as an act of condescension to their weakness. This would be to rob the Transfiguration of very much of its meaning. For the Lord Himself also this prelibation of glory had doubtless its highest significance. It was a mighty strengthening and refreshing of Himself, no less than of his disciples, against that coming day of humiliation and agony. He did not merely manifest to others that glory which should one day be his, but became more fully conscious of it Himself, and that He already possessed it; however He might voluntarily defer its full manifestation;—not to say that in this momentary breaking forth of that inward splendour, for the most part hindered and restrained by the sackcloth covering of the flesh, there was a step in the progressive glorifying of that humanity which He had assumed. But it will be better not to anticipate what will presently find its fitter place.

‘After six days Jesus taketh with Him Peter and James and John.’ Not without a meaning is it so carefully noted by all the Evangelists that it was ‘after six days’ (Matthew, Mark)—the *‘eight days after’*¹ of St. Luke being no contradiction, but only a different way of counting, leaving as it does the six complete days between—that the Transfiguration found place. There are six days of the world’s work, which the seventh day’s glory, of which we have here a foretaste, is to follow. Three of his disciples the Lord takes with Him, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established (Deut. xix. 15); these three, the flower and crown of the apostolic band, the

¹ Gerhard (Loci Theoll. xxxii. 2): Post dies sex Christus coram discipulis transfiguratur; sic exacto hujus vitæ sextiduo succedet æternum sabbatum, in quo piorum corpora clarificabuntur. Quid tota hæc vita aliud est quam sex dies laboris? illos sequetur quies sabbati, et piorum gloria æterna.

'coryphæi,' as Chrysostom calls them, and not now alone favoured above the rest (Matt. xxvi. 37; Luke viii. 51); they are Peter, who loved Him so much (John xxi. 17), and John, whom He loved so much (John xxv. 20), and James, who should first attest that death could as little as life separate from his love (Acts xii. 1); being the same three who should hereafter be witnesses of the deepest depth of his humiliation in the Agony of the garden; and who therefore were thus fitly forearmed by what they now beheld against what they should then behold.

Having taken these, He 'leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themselves.' The tradition which makes Mount Tabor to have been this 'high mountain,' though for many ages not so much as called in question, does not date farther back than the fourth century, Cyril of Jerusalem¹ being the first to mention it. Indeed there is an earlier tradition still, which places the scene of the Transfiguration on the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem,² but one which seems to have obtained little acceptance. Tabor having been once fixed on (it probably was so, as the highest and goodliest mountain in Galilee, rising in an almost perfect cone from the plain,³ and, though unnamed in the New, of frequent commemoration in the Old Testament; thus see Judg. iv. 6, 14; viii. 18; Ps. lxxxix. 12; Jer. xlvi. 18), there were built churches, and presently monasteries, on its summit—three of the former to correspond to the three tabernacles which Peter was not permitted to build! But while evidence in favour of

¹ Catech. xii. 16. In the Greek Church the festival of the Transfiguration (Aug. 6) has derived its name, τὸ Θαβώρον, from this tradition.

² Ritter gives in proof a reference, Itin. Anton. Aug. et Hierosolitanum, ed. Parthey, 1843, which I have not verified.

³ Δόφος μακροειδής Polybius (v. 70. 6) calls it.

Tabor there is absolutely none, that against it is strong, is indeed decisive. 'The historical data which we possess, shew that the summit of the mountain was employed without any intermission between the times of Antiochus the Great, 218 B. C., and the destruction of Jerusalem under Vespasian, as a stronghold, and was by no means the scene of peace and solitude whither one would flee, anxious to escape the turmoil of the world. The consecration which quiet and seclusion give was only reached after the fortresses which once crowned its summit had been 'laid low.'¹ It is impossible therefore that Tabor can have been that 'holy mountain,' to which the Lord retired that He with his three disciples might be there, 'apart by themselves.' It may perhaps have been Hermon, or one of the spurs of the Antilebanon. But, whatever mountain it was, it certainly is not for nothing that this and so many other of the most memorable events in Holy Scripture find place upon mountains; as the offering of Isaac (Gen. xxii. 14), the giving of the old Law (Exod. xix.; Deut. xxxiii. 2), and of the new (Matt. v. 1), the last decisive conflict between Jehovah and Baal (1 Kin. xviii.), the apparition of the risen Lord (Matt. xxviii. 16); from 'a very high mountain' the vision of the New Jerusalem is vouchsafed to Ezekiel (xl. 2), and to St John (Rev. xxi. 10). It was not by accident that in the days of his flesh the Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi. 37; John vi. 15), even as, according to St. Luke, it was for prayer that He retired to this the mount of his Transfiguration. Towering above the smoke and stir of this dim and lower earth, advancing their heads into a purer atmosphere and one nearer to heaven, they have in them a sort of natural 'Sursum corda,' which constitutes them fittest spots for such nearer commerce with God, or special communications from Him.¹

¹ Ritter, Comparative Geography of Palestine, English translation, vol. ii. p. 313; compare Robinson, Bibl. Researches, vol. iii. pp. 220-225; Herzog, Encyclopädie, art. Thabor.

Being there, 'He was transfigured before them.' St. Luke, writing primarily for Greek readers, avoids this word, 'transfigured,' or transformed; ('metamorphosed' would be a still closer rendering), which St. Matthew and St. Mark do not shrink from employing. He avoids it, probably, because of the associations of the heathen mythology, which would so easily, and almost inevitably, attach themselves to it in the imagination of a Greek.² He is satisfied with telling us 'that the fashion of his countenance was altered;' adding to this that it was 'as He prayed' that this marvellous change came over Him (cf. Isai. lxxv. 24; Dan. ix. 21; 2 Cor. iii. 18, where the significant word μεταμορφούμεθα occurs). It was a change not without its weaker analogies, and prophetic anticipations in other personages of Scripture, in Moses for example, when the skin of his face shone after he had come from talking with God upon the mount (Exod. xxxiv. 29-35); which circumstance therefore Hilary rightly calls a figure of the Transfiguration.³ Another such figure, though not now an anticipation, but a reminiscence of it, the martyrdom of St. Stephen affords, when those who looked at him 'saw his face as it had been the face of an angel' (Acts xvi. 15); and how often at the departure of holy saints and servants of God has some such gleam of the coming glory been observed to light up their countenances even here.

¹ Witsius (De Glorif. Jesu in Monte, 7): Sed et ipsa Transfiguratio videbatur montem poscere, eumque sublimem; ut loci ratio responderet conditioni gloriæ in quâ tunc Christus conspiciebatur.

² Jerome warns against such an abuse of μεταμορφώθη here: Nemo putet pristinam eum formam amisisse; non substantia tollitur, sed gloria commutatur. Anselm: Non formam humani corporis amisit, sed suam suorumque glorificationem præmonstravit. In naming this great event, the German theology, calling it 'die Verklärung,' or 'the Glorification' (it is frequently 'Clarificatio' in the early Lutheran divines), has seized this point, not exactly the same as our 'Transfiguration.'

³ Figura transfigurationis.

But in the Lord of glory it was not the countenance only, which thus wore a splendour different from the common; in addition to this, 'his raiment was white and glistering;' ¹ or, as St. Mark has it, 'became shining, exceeding white as snow' (cf. Rev. i. 14), 'so as no fuller on earth can white them.' It was probably night, when this marvellous spectacle was vouchsafed to the disciples. Such an assumption best explains 'the next day' of Luke ix. 37. This, if it was so, must have infinitely enhanced the grandeur of the vision; although the brightness doubtless was such as would have paled even the noonday sun (Acts xxii. 10). Indeed all words seem weak to the Evangelists, all images to fail them here. St. Mark, whose words I have quoted, borrows one image from the world of nature, another from that of man's art and device; by these he struggles to set forth and reproduce for his readers the transcendent brightness of that light which now arrayed, and from head to foot, the person of the Lord, breaking forth from within, and overflowing the very garments which He wore; until in their eyes who beheld, He seemed to clothe Himself with light as with a garment, light being indeed the proper and peculiar garment of Deity (Ps. civ. 2; Hab. iii. 4). In the circumstance that his glory was not one which was lent Him, but his own, bursting forth as from an inner fountain of light, not merely gilding Him from without; not playing, like that of Moses, on the skin and surface of his countenance, perhaps also in its being a glory which arrayed not his face alone, but his entire person, we have those tokens of superiority, those prerogatives of the Master above the servants, which we are evermore able to trace even in matters wherein one or another of these may seem to have anticipated, and thus to have come into some sort of competition with Him.¹

¹ Bengel: ἱεραστράπτων, ab intra, gloriâ corporis translucente, et poros vestimenti permeante; compare the ἐκλάμψουσι, which the Lord ascribes and promises to his saints, Matt. xiii. 43. Λευκός ἱεραστράπτων is not 'white and glistering' (E. V.); but ἱεραστράπτων (cf. Ezek. i. 4, 7; Nah. iii. 3) is the modal explanation of λευκός, 'white,' and so white that it was 'glistering' as well. This last word is a happy one; 'effulgent,' which hardly existed in the language when our Version was made, would not express it as well, while 'fulgorant,' and 'effulgorant,' are too merely Latin words. As 'glistering' in like manner we are to understand the 'raiment white as snow' of the angel at the empty tomb (Matt. xxviii. 3); not the garment of innocence, but of glory; the same angel being described in St. Luke as clothed 'in shining garments' (ἀστραπτούσας); so too 'the great white throne' of Rev. xx. 11 is equivalent to 'the throne of glory' of Matt. xxv. 31, for light at the utmost intensity is white; from this, too, we may further explain Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14.

I have lightly touched already, and shall have occasion

¹ Witsius (Melet. Leid. p. 306): Quorsum ea omnia? Et Christi causa, et nostri. Christi intererat ut hæc ipsi evenirent, quippe quem Pater hæc quâdam cœlestis gloriæ anticipatione ad instans certamen animare constituit. Quum difficultates prophetici muneris suscipiendæ essent, aperturâ cœli, descensu Spiritûs, et compellatione Patris gratissimâ, mirabiliter animatus est (Matt. iii. 16). Nunc quum instaret tempus quo se ut Pontifex Patri oblaturus erat æquum fuit ut splendidis vestibibus exornatus, ex earum ac faciei suæ fulgore experiundo disceret, quæ post sui oblationem gloria ipsum maneret in cœlis. Instabat horn, quâ controversia ipsi de regno contumeliosissimum in modum movenda, et regni professio in crimen mortepiandum imputanda, regique ipsius dignitas infami ludibrio exponenda erat. Sed insolitâ hæc plus quam regii splendoris exhibitione clarius demonstravit Rex cœlorum quanto ipsum in honore haberet, quam Assuerus olim Mardocheo, in omni isto invidiosæ pompæ apparatu, quem ei per Hamanem præstari jussit.

to dwell further on some aspects, in which the Transfiguration may be regarded as designed to strengthen and encourage the hearts first of those who witnessed it, and then of all those to whom their witness came. But in addition to these it has ever been contemplated in the Church as a prophecy of the glory which the saints shall have in the resurrection.¹ As was the body of Christ on the Mount, so hereafter shall their bodies be. It is difficult not to recognize a direct reference to the Transfiguration in the words of St. Paul, where he speaks of Christ's body of glory to which hereafter the body of our humiliation shall be conformed (Phil. iii. 21); while in passages out of number we have hints of the luminous character of the future glorified bodies of the redeemed (Dan. xii. 3; Matt. xiii. 43; 1 Cor. xv. 43; Col. iii. 4; 1 Pet. v. 1; Rev. iii. 4, 5; Wisd. v. 7); all these Scriptures pointing to the glorious conformity of their bodies then, with all which his body at this time was, who now shewed in Himself, as the first fruits of the new creation, what hereafter He should shew in all them that were his.

‘And behold’ (wonder within wonder), ‘there appeared unto them Moses and Elias, talking with Him.’² The

¹ Leo the Great (Serm. xciv.): In transfiguratione illud principaliter agebatur, ut de cordibus discipulorum scandalum crucis tolleretur; sed non minore providentiâ spes Sanctæ Ecclesiæ fundabatur, ut totum corpus Christi agnosceret quali esset commutatione donandum, ut ejus sibi honoris consortium membra promitterent, qui in capite præfulsisset. Gregory the Great (Moral. xxxii. 6): In transfiguratione quid aliud quam resurrectionis ultima gloria nunciatur? So in the Greek service-books: δείξαι βουλόμενος τῆς ἀναστάσεως τὴν λαμπρότητα.

² One of the best and soundest of the Mystics, Richard of St. Victor, warning against visions, and urging the necessity of trying all such by the Word of God, of making that the standard by which all subjective revelations should be tried, whether they were indeed of God, or only delusions of the enemy, has some striking admonitions drawn from this presence of question, How the disciples knew these two to be Moses and Elias, is surely an idle one ; and the suggestion that they gathered their knowledge from the conversation which they overheard, or that they recognized the horns of Moses, or the ascetic garments of Elias, merely superfluous. That elevation of their whole spiritual life, that ecstatic state of a divine clairvoyance, if we may use this word without offence, in which alone they could have seen these sights at all, will have left them in no doubt concerning those whom they now saw, holding this converse with their Lord. Their recognition of them we must regard as immediate and intuitive.¹ It is the same question as is sometimes asked about Paul, namely, how he should have seen in a vision a man whose name he knew to be Ananias (Acts. ix. 12). It can only be replied that the vision which shewed him the man, imparted to him also the name of the man.

But while this question may thus be dismissed, we cannot so dismiss another, namely, why the two who appear should be exactly Moses and Elias? It was not merely that among all the prophets and saints of the Moses and Elias with the Lord in the Mount (Benjamin Minor, lxxxi.): Sed si jam te existimas ascendisse ad cor altum, et apprehendisse montem illum excelsum et magnum, si jam te credis Christum videre transfiguratum, quidquid in illo videas, quidquid ab illo audias, non ei facile credas, nisi occurrant ei Moyses et Elias. Suspecta est mihi omnis veritas quam non confirmat Scripturarum auctoritas, nec Christum in sua clarificatione recipio, si non assistant ei Moyses et Elias. Compare Thauler, Homilia, 1553, p. 540.

¹ As Sedulius (Carm. Pasch. 286) puts it well:

Ignotos oculis viderunt lumine cordis.

He proceeds with verses which are worth quoting, on the purpose of their appearing :

Ut major sit nostra fides, hunc esse per orbem
Principium et finem, hunc Alpha viderier, hunc Ω, Quem medium tales circumfulsere prophetæ.

Old Testament these were the two, of whom the one had not died (2 Kin. ii. 2; cf. Eccus. 48), and the other had no sooner tasted of death than probably his body was withdrawn from under the dominion of death and of him that had the power of death (Deut. xxxiv. 6; Jude 9); the two, therefore, whose apparition in glorified bodies before the day of resurrection had less in it perplexing than that of any others would have had. This was something; but much more that these two were the acknowledged heads and representatives, the one of the Law, the other of the prophets; in which Law and prophets the whole Old Testament is commonly summed up (Matt. vii. 12).¹

‘And they were talking with Jesus.’ What the matter of this august conference was only St. Luke tells us, namely, that ‘they spake of his decease,’² which He should accom-

¹ It behoved the Lord, in Tertullian’s words (Adv. Marc. iv. 22), cum illis videri, quibus in revelationibus erat visus; cum illis loqui, qui eum fuerant locuti; cum eis gloriam suam communicare, a quibus Dominus gloriæ nuncupabatur; cum principalibus suis, quorum alter populi informator aliquando, alter reformator quandoque, alter initiator Veteris Testamenti, alter consummator Novi. Augustine (Serm. 232): Evangelium testimonium habet a Lege et prophetis. Ideo et in monte quando voluit ostendere Dominus noster Jesus gloriam suam, inter Moysen et Eliam stetit. Medius in honore ipse fulgebat; Lex et prophetæ a lateribus adtestabantur. Cf. Serm. 78: Hic Dominus, hic Lex et Prophetæ; sed Dominus tanquam Dominus; Lex in Moyse, Prophetia in Eliâ; sed ipsi tanquam servi, tanquam ministri. Ipsi tanquam vasa, ipse tanquam fons. Moyses et Prophetæ dicebant, et scribebant; sed de illo implebantur, quando fundebant. cf. De Doctr. Christ. ii. 25; Leo the Great (Serm. 94): Quid hoc stabilius, quid firmitus verbo, in cuius prædicatione Veteris et Novi Testamenti concinit tuba, et cum Evangelicâ doctrinâ antiquarum protestationum instrumenta concurrunt? Adstipulantur enim sibi invicem utriusque fœderis paginæ, et quem sub velamine mysteriorum præcedentia signa promiserant manifestum atque perspicuum præsentis gloriæ splendor ostendit.

² Τὴν ἔξοδον. The word is not without its special solemnity. He who has an exodus (Acts xiii. 24) into the world, has also an exodos out of the world. St. Peter employs the same word of his own ‘decease,’ 2 Pet. i. 15; cf. Wisd. vii. 6; for a similar use of ἐκβασις, see Heb. xiii. 7; of ἀφίξις, Acts xx. 29. Bengel: Vocabulum valde grave, quo continetur Passio, Crux, plish at Jerusalem; of that 'decease' prefigured by the types of the law (Num. xxi. 9; Exod. xii. 46) fore-announced by the oracles of the prophets (Zech. xii. 10; Isai. liii. 9).¹ 'Decease' has now become so mere a synonym for death, it has so much lost its proper sense of departure, i. e. out of this life (decessus), that, as we read in the English, we are in danger of missing, indeed we can hardly help missing, an allusion which must at once suggest itself to every reader of the Greek. We fail to mark the relation, which the sacred historian could scarcely not have intended us to recognize, between this 'exodus' and an earlier; to recognize in this an 'accomplishing' or fulfilling, as he is careful to note, by the Saviour at Jerusalem of an 'exodus' (Heb. xi. 22) which Moses and Joshua had begun in Egypt and in the wilderness, but had not accomplished (Heb. iv.); the 'exodus,' that is, or going out of God's people, their Captain and Commander leading the way, from this present evil world.

The unity of the Old and New Covenant is wonderfully attested in this apparition of the princes of the Old in solemn yet familiar intercourse with the Lord of the New; and not the unity only, but with this unity the subordination of the Old to the New, that 'Christ is the end of the law' (Rom. x. 4), and the object to which all prophecy

Mors, Resurrectio, Adscensio. The Latin excessus, which is an exact parallel, has precisely the same more solemn use; thus Cicero (Rep. ii. 30): Post obitum, vel potius excessum Romuli. It is noticeable that Chrysostom twice reads δέξαι here; which is not a mere inadvertence, for he comments on the word which he thus reads. There is no vestige of any such reading having ever existed.

¹ Gerhard (Harm. 87): Institutum itaque fuit colloquium de illo ipso articulo, quo apostoli paulo ante offensi fuerant; nimirum de passione et morte Servatoris nostri, Jesu Christi.

pointed (Acts x. 43; xxviii. 23; Rom. iii. 21), that therefore the great purpose of these had now been fulfilled; all which was declared in the fact that, after their testimony thus given, Moses and Elias disappear, while Christ only remains. It need hardly be observed what strength there was here, and in the remembrance of this scene, for the disciples, when they should afterwards behold their Lord put to death as a breaker of the law of Moses, as a false snatcher to Himself of the words of the prophets.

'But Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep; and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with Him.' These words are too often misunderstood, indeed, until the translation is corrected, they can hardly fail to be misunderstood. It is usual to take the disciples to task for this sleep of theirs at such a moment,¹ and to find a parallel to it in the sleep of the same three in the garden of Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 40-45). The parallel is altogether misleading. That was a somnolence not without its guilt; while they were sleeping that untimely sleep, they should have been watching and praying, seeking strength for themselves and help for their Lord. But that the eyes of the disciples here 'were heavy with sleep,' this might be, and was, an evidence of human infirmity—of the inability of this frail nature of ours to bear a weight of glory, when it is laid upon it, but this was all.² The true parallels to the words before us are Gen. xv. 12; Dan. x. 9; Zech. iv. 1; and we may add, as materially helping to illustrate what the condition of the three apostles was, Num. xxiv. 4. Theirs in fact was an ecstatic state, one of a divine clairvoyance; even as in such only would they have been capable of beholding what they then beheld; their eyes burdened with sleep, but they not asleep; for having resisted all the temptations of this frail nature to succumb under the burden of this glory—and what a burden it is to be the immediate recipient of any divine revelation Daniel has often told us (vii. 28; viii. 27; x. 8, 11, 16)—‘having kept themselves awake throughout’ (for this, and not ‘when they were awake,’ is the right rendering),¹ ‘they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with Him.’ The disciples saw this vision, as indeed it only could have been seen, ‘in spirit’ (Acts x. 10; xi. 5; xxii. 27; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Rev. i. 10); whether in the body or out of the body they could not, any more than St. Paul in a later ecstasy (2 Cor. xii. 3), have told.² It is from this point of view, and keeping this in mind, that we must explain another notice which also we owe exclusively to St. Luke—his comment, namely, on St. Peter’s proposal which presently follows—to wit, that he made it ‘not knowing what he said.’ Tertullian long ago gave the right explanation of this ‘not knowing what he said,’³ which many have subsequently missed.¹ It is no apology upon the part of the Evangelist for St. Peter's untimely proposal, still less a judgment upon it. Shortsighted, inopportune it may have been; and, while testifying for his zeal and for his delight in that heavenly communion, in some sense it was. This, however, is not what St. Luke would affirm; but that he so spake, being out of himself, not indeed demens but amens, rapt into another world, a world of fear and wonder, into conditions altogether remote from the common; as appears still more plainly in the parallel statement of St. Mark; 'for he wist not what to say, for they were sore afraid.'

¹ Thus Gerhard (Loc. Theoll. xxxii. 2): Discipuli somno erant gravati, per quem denotatur nostra somnolentia, quod gloriam vitæ æternæ non satis æstimamus ac meditamur.

² Chrysostom has a right insight into the matter: ἵπνον ἐνταῦθα καλῶν [ὁ Λουκᾶς] τὸν πολλὸν κᾶρον τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης ἐκείνης αὐτοῖς ἐγγινόμενον And Ambrose: Somno gravati erant. Premit enim incomprehensibilis splendor divinitatis nostri corporis sensus.

¹ Διαγρηγορήσαντες, not vigilantes (Vulg.), nor cum evigilassent (Beza), nor postquam experfecti sunt (Castalio), which all are in error. Διαγρηγορέω Rost and Palm rightly render durchwachen, and refer to Herodian, iii. 4. 8: πασὴς τῆς νυκτὸς διαγρηγορήσαντες.

² Compare Philo, Quis Rer. Div. Hæres, § 53, who there and elsewhere has much to say on the true character of the Scriptural ἐκστασις, which word he found in his Septuagint at Gen. ii. 21; xv. 12.

³ Adv. Marc. iv. 22: In spiritu enim homo constitutus, præsertim cum gloriam Dei conspiciat, vel cum per ipsum Deus loquitur, necesse est excidat

To return, however, to his actual words: 'Then answered Peter, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if Thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.' This proposal, as St. Luke, again significantly completing the other Evangelists, informs us, he made, 'as they departed from Him.'² It is too brief a converse, too transient a glimpse and foretaste of the heavenly glory. He will fain detain these august visitors. Wherefore should all these marvels of the higher world be shewn to them, only to be withdrawn again in an instant. 'It is good for us to be here'—better, as no doubt he felt, than to be rejected of the Jews, better than to suffer many things of the Elders and Chief Priests and Scribes, and be killed (Matt. xvi. 21). But that holy retirement in which they were was sensu, obumbratus scilicet virtute divinâ . . . Interim facile est amentiam [=ἐκστασιν] Petri probare. Quomodo enim Moysem et Eliam cognovisset nisi in spiritu?

¹ Gerhard for example: Hanc vocem ex carnali inscitâ profectum esse Lucas testatur, Non enim noverat quid loqueretur.

² A somewhat feeble rendering of ἐν τῷ διαχωρίζεσθαι αὐτοὺς ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, on which Beza rightly comments, e conspectu abrepti.

'good,' as he esteemed it, not merely as a safe withdrawal from all this evil, but also for the sweetness which he found in the communion and fellowship which it offered. 'But what,' exclaims Anselm in a sermon of extraordinary richness and beauty, from which I have already quoted one or two fragments, 'if the contemplation of Christ's glorified manhood so filled the apostle with joy that he was unwilling to be sundered from it, how shall it fare with them who attain to the contemplation of his glorious Godhead? and if it was so good a thing to dwell with two of his saints, how then to come to the heavenly Jerusalem, to the general assembly and Church of the firstborn that are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to these, not seen through a glass and darkly, but face to face?'

But tarrying on the summit of that mountain they will need, as the apostle conceives, that some kind of shelter be provided for them; so are things earthly confused with things heavenly in his mind. He, ever prompt for action, as ready with the labour of his hands as with the love of his heart, aided by the other two, will quickly prepare some slight booths of the branches of trees, or of whatever else may come to hand, in which they may tarry: 'let us make here three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.'¹ That there is any allusion here to the Feast of Tabernacles, that St. Peter is measuring here the heavenly felicity by that poor earthly copy, I cannot for an instant believe; and altogether it seems to me that he is very needlessly schooled and found fault with by modern commentators, and, indeed, by some ancient interpreters as well, for these words of his. At the same time, that there is a certain fault in them is unquestionable. In this proposal he did not maintain himself at the height of that great confession which he had so lately made (Matt. xvi. 16). He who could thus speak, even though he meant it honourably for his Master, yet plainly declared, thus putting those other two on the same level with Him, that he did not yet perceive how far that Master transcended all other, even the princes of the elder dispensation, how far higher a dispensation had begun with Him;¹ herein revealed his own need of the teaching of that vision and that voice, which was presently to be vouchsafed to him and to his fellows; for we have a right to see in what immediately succeeds the answer from heaven to that word of his:² 'while he yet spake, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them,' not the disciples, but the legislator and the prophet, and perhaps also Him that was the Lord alike of them both.

¹ Ambrose: Impiger operarius communis obsequii ministerium pollicetur.

A cloud is the constant symbol, or if not always this, the accompaniment, of the divine presence (Exod. xiv. 19; xix. 16; xxxiii. 9; xl. 34; 1 Kin. viii. 10; Ps. civ. 3;

¹ Jerome: Erras, Petre, sicut et alius Evangelista testatur, Nescis quid dicas. Noli tria tabernacula querere, cum unum sit tabernaculum Evangelii, in quo Lex et Prophetæ recapitulanda sunt. Nequaquam servos cum Domino conferas.

² Augustine (Serm. 78.): Videt hoc Petrus, et humana sapiens tanquam homo: Domine, bonum est, inquit, nos hic esse. Tædium patiebatur a turbâ, invenerat solitudinem montis; ibi habebat Christum panem mentis. Ut quid inde discederet ad labores et dolores, habens in Deum sanctos amores, et ideo bonos mores? Bene sibi volebat esse; unde et adjunxit, Si vis, faciamus hic tria tabernacula: Tibi unum, Moysi unum, et Eliæ unum. Ad hæc Dominus nihil respondit: sed tamen Petro responsum est. Hæc enim eo loquente, nubes lucida venit, et obumbravit eos. Ille quærebat tria tabernacula: nobis unum esse, quod humanus sensus dividere cupiebat, responsum cæleste monstravit. Verbum Dei Christus, Verbum Dei in lege, Verbum in Prophetis. Quid, Petre, quæris dividere? Magis te oportet adungere. Tria quæris; intellige et unum.

Isai. xix. 1 ; Dan. vii. 13). There is a manifest fitness in the symbol. The clouds of our lower world veil, sheath, render tolerable to mortal eyes the splendour of the heavens, the brightness of the sun, which otherwise we could not endure to behold. But in the Old Testament, a ministration of condemnation (2 Cor. iii. 9), the cloud is a dark cloud, a thick cloud (1 Kin. viii. 12) ; for God, though in part revealing, is also in part a God that hideth, Himself (Isai. xlv. 15) ; it is often a cloud charged with thunder and lightning, and all the dread artillery of heaven (Exod. xix. 16 ; Ps. cvii. 2 ; xviii. 12) ; for there was in that dispensation the utterance of God's displeasure against the sins of men. But the cloud which now overshadows these is 'a bright cloud;' yet, bright as it is, still serving the purpose of veiling the more intolerable brightness within, even that of God's very presence in this the Schechina or place of his dwelling ; and making possible for mortal and sinful men to stand in that presence and live, which would else have been impossible for them (Exod. xxxiii. 20 ; Judg. xiii. 22).¹

It may seem strange at first that even to this cloud a power of thus overshadowing and concealing should be ascribed ; yet it is not really strange ; for light in its utmost intensity performs the effect of darkness, hides as effectually as the darkness would do. Thus see 1 Tim. vi. 16,² and compare the words of Milton, 'dark with excess of light;' and of Wordsworth, 'a glorious privacy of light;' in like manner Philo affirms of the highest light that it is identical with darkness (γνόφος), even as it is the character of extremes evermore to meet. They were hidden in that blaze of intolerable light from the eyes of the disciples, who 'feared as they entered into the cloud' (Luke ix. 34), feared with that fear which evermore falls on sinful men when brought suddenly into immediate nearness with the pure and awful presences of heaven. They may have feared too that their Lord was now about to be taken from them, to anticipate the day of his Ascension, and to mount already the cloud-chariot which was one day to bear Him from their sight (Acts i. 9); for the Transfiguration must have made plain to them as to Himself that He needed not the painful passage of death by which to enter into glory; that if He still laid down his life, it was not of necessity, but of freest love.

¹ Ambrose : Ut apostoli Dei loquentis majestatem interpositâ nube ferre possent.

² Anselm, quoting these words of St. Paul, 'Who dwelleth in light unapproachable,' and then the words of Moses, 'And Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was' (Exod. xx. 21), and bringing both passages into connexion with this present, says profoundly, Illa caligo et ista nubes atque illa lux idem sunt.

And then it must have been fear upon fear, when 'behold, a voice out of the cloud,' the same voice which had once before been heard at the Baptism (Matt. iii. 17), and which should salute Him again as He stood on the threshold of his Passion (John xii. 28); and thus at the beginning, at the middle, and at the close of his ministry, 'This is my beloved¹ Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him.' This voice is said by St. Peter to have come 'from the excellent glory' (2 Pet. i. 17); from Him, that is, who dwelt in the cloud, which was the symbol and the vehicle of the divine presence.² In respect of

¹ Ἀγαπητός in St. Matthew and St. Mark; but ἐκλεκτός (cf. ἐκλεκτός, Luke xxiii. 35) seems now recognized as the true reading in St. Luke.

² St. Peter in this same passage, looking back at the privilege vouchsafed to him and to the 'sons of thunder,' speaks of himself and them as 'eye-witnesses of the majesty' (ἐπόπται γενηθέντες τῆς μεγαλειότητος). Ἐπόπτης, the heavenly salutation itself, the emphasis should not be so much laid on 'This' as on 'Son;' for the true parallel to the present salutation of the Son by the Father, with the installation of the Son in the highest place of the kingdom, is to be found at Heb. i. 1: 'God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son.' He is to be heard above all others, because He is not a servant in the house of another, as were Moses and Elias, but a Son in his own (Heb. iii. 5). In the words themselves of this majestic installation there is a remarkable honouring of the Old Testament, and of it in all its parts, which can scarcely be regarded as accidental; for the three several clauses of that salutation are drawn severally from the Psalms (Ps. ii. 7), the Prophets (Isai. xlii. 1), and the Law (Deut. xviii. 5); and, as we shall see, they do together proclaim Him concerning whom they are spoken to be the King, the Priest, and the Prophet of the New Covenant. St. Peter therefore might very fitly declare that in this voice from heaven 'He received from God the Father honour and glory' (2 Pet. i. 17). And first, 'This is my beloved Son;' but the King's Son is Himself the King; 'yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Sion' (Ps. ii. 6). And then, 'in whom I am well pleased;' holy, therefore, harmless and undefiled, fairer than the children of men (Ps. xlv. 2), the a technical word, too weakly rendered 'eye-witness,' though it would not be easy to suggest a better rendering, sets well before us the light in which the apostle regarded his and their relation to the things which they were permitted to behold. The ἐπόπτης is properly one admitted and initiated into secret and holy mysteries, the Eleusinian for example, or any other reserved from the common gaze. Such an initiation, he would imply, into the secretest and holiest mysteries of all, had been theirs.

sceptre of whose kingdom is a sceptre of righteousness (Heb. i. 8), for in no other could God take a perfect pleasure; and thus the Priest who could and should offer Himself without spot to God (Heb. ix. 14; 1 John iii. 5). But then, further, He is the One whom all are commanded to obey: 'Hear ye Him;' therefore henceforth the sole Prophet of his Church; Moses, or the Law, has passed away, for that was the shadow and outline of good things to come (Col. ii. 17; Heb. viii. 5; x. 1), while in Him is the substance of good things actually present; Elias, or the prophets, has passed away, for in Him all prophecy is fulfilled (Luke xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xiii. 8). They, belonging as they did to a merely preparatory dispensation, vanish; but Christ, who is the Head of an everlasting dispensation, after whom we do not look for another, remains; and this will explain how it came to pass that 'when they had lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only.'¹

But before accompanying the Lord and his three disciples, as they descend again from that Mount of Vision to this common workday world of ours, with all its labour and suffering and sin, we may pause for a word or two on a subject common to all the Evangelists, but on which St. Matthew dwells most in detail. All have told us of the fear which overcame the three, even while they felt it most good and blessed to be there. But amazing as had been the sights which they saw, it would appear that it was not these so much as the voice from heaven, the awfulness of that direct speaking of God with man, which man is so little able to endure (cf. Hab. iii. 2, 16; Exod. xx. 19; Heb. xii. 19), that brought them to the extremity of their fear: 'And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid'—this fear of theirs uttering itself, as is so constantly its manner (Gen. xvii. 1; Josh. v. 14; Judg. xiii. 20; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17; Luke xxiv. 5; Acts ix. 4; Rev. i. 17), in an attitude, suggested by those moral instincts of awe, by that sense of his own utter unfitness to stand face to face with the holiness of God, which any near revelation of that holiness must inevitably awaken in the heart of man.¹ To hide the face is the first impulse and instinct of such a moment (Exod. iii. 6; 1 Kin. xix. 17); to fall on the face is the most effectual way of so doing, and at the same time of outwardly expressing the inner conviction that for man there is no standing in his own right before God.

¹ I have made more than one citation from a long and interesting passage on the Transfiguration in Tertullian (Adv. Marc. iv. 22). Marcion, in his assault upon the Old Testament and the old Economy, as proceeding from another God than the author of the New, had found in this transaction not Christ preferred to Moses and Elias, but Christ honoured and Moses and Elias dishonoured. Tertullian's reply is admirable throughout. Strange, he says, if this were intended, that they should appear talking with Him, which is an evidence of familiarity; sharing in the same glory, which is an evidence of favour and acceptance. These are some of the concluding words: Itaque etsi facta translatio sit auditionis a Moyse et Heliâ in Christo, sed non ut ab alio Deo, nec ad alium Christum, sed a Creatore in Christum ejus, secundum decessionem Veteris, et successionem Novi Testamenti. Tradidit igitur Pater Filio discipulos novos, ostensis prius cum illo Moyse et Heliâ in claritatis prærogativâ, atque ita dimissis, quasi jam et officio et honore disunctis.

¹ Witsius (De Glorif. Jesu in Monte, 39): Quoties enim cunque Deus suam animis nostris majestatem illustribus documentis ingerit, toties nostræ non vilitatis solum sed et impuritatis et omnigenæ indignitatis conscientia vivide expergiscitur; unde fit ut ad tam sublimis puritatis et magnificentissimæ gloriæ præsentiam trepidemus. Neque id solis contingit improbis, quibus formidolosa semper vindictis Dei cogitatio est, sed et piis, imo et amicis Dei ac familiaribus, quibus eo venerabilior semper summi Numinis majestas est, quo clarius conspicitur ejus bonitas; et qui nunquam sibi ipsis magis sordent, quam cum in liquidissimâ ac divinæ Gloriæ luce contuentur.

'And Jesus came and touched them ;' as He, now the Incarnate Word, and once the Angel of the Covenant, had touched Daniel (Dan. x. 10), and Jeremiah (Jer. i. 9), and Ezekiel (Ezek. ii. 2); as by the hand of a ministering spirit He had touched the lips of Isaiah (Isai. vi. 7); as hereafter, the glorified Son of man, walking among the golden candlesticks, He should, under circumstances not unlike, touch or lay his right hand once more upon one of these same three (Rev. i. 17). And with that touch there goes also the reassuring word, that 'Fear not,' which even the holiest need so much, when God has shewn them their unholiness, the depths of their corruption, the abundant cause which as sinful men they have to fear, cause so abundant that no other but He can enable them to lay this fear aside (Judg. vi. 23; Dan. x. 12; Matt. xxviii. 5; Luke v. 10).¹

An important discourse follows, which the Lord held with his three favoured disciples, as they were descending from the mount, and leaving all its mysterious marvels behind them. And first the charge to silence, the seal which was set upon their lips, not to be removed till after the Resurrection: 'And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision¹ to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead. The three Evangelists here remarkably complete one another. St. Matthew, thus mentioning the injunction to silence, does not mention how well the disciples obeyed it; while St. Luke, mentioning the fact of silence—‘they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen,’—does not state that this was in obedience to an express command; only St. Mark, with his own characteristic fulness of detail, records both the express command given by the Lord, and the observation of it by the disciples (ix. 9, 10). That ‘Tell the vision to no man,’ implies that they were forbidden to reveal what they had seen even to their fellow-apostles themselves—a hard precept, yet one which was obeyed by them. At the same time, however strict the silence which they kept, we cannot imagine that even so the vision was only for themselves, and altogether lost upon the others. There must have pierced through the whole demeanour of these three, as they returned to fellowship with the others, evident tokens that they had not been for nothing on that holy mount. The others, in one way or another, must have been convinced that they had seen sights and heard words which had strengthened and reassured their faith, and must have found in this a strengthening and reassuring of their own.

¹ Witsius: Non caruit successu ea Christi compellatio, quippe quâ ex-pergefacti velut a veterno aliquo apostoli, accurate omnia circumspererunt. Sed quocunque oculos verterent, nihil eorum deprehenderunt quæ nuper tam admiranda ipsis videbantur. Neminem viderunt, nisi solum Jesum, suetâ formâ, solito amictu. Non decebat diutius in terrâ commorari Mosem et Eliam, quorum ministerium neque cum Jesu magisterio, neque cum apostolorum functione miscendum aut confundendum erat. Discessit igitur Moyses, discessit Elias; imo siluit vox ipsa cælestis Patris, quæ semel locuta est, ut semper audiat Filius. Christus ipse depositâ nuperæ Transfigurationis gloriâ ad pristinum servi statum habitumque rediit; temporariam enim eam gloriam esse decuit, quæ non nisi præludium æternæ fuit; multaque adhuc perpetienda restabant Christo, antequam æternâ illâ potiretur.

¹ ὄραμα, not in use distinguishable from ὁπτασία (Luke i. 22; Acts xxvi. 19; 2 Cor. xii. 1), or from ὁρασις (Acts ii. 17; Rev. ix. 17), is exactly ‘a vision;’ what a man most truly sees, but sees because God enables him to see it, because it is shewn to him; which he sees, as the three disciples saw this vision, ἐν πνεύματι, as contrasted with ἐν νοῷ (1 Cor. xiv. 15, 16). So ὄραμα is invariably used in the Acts, where alone, with the exception of this one passage, it occurs in the New Testament; but there no less than eleven times (vii. 31; ix. 10, 12; x. 5, 17, 19; xi. 5; xii. 9; xvi. 9, 10; xviii. 9; cf. Gen. xv. 1; Dan. ii. 19; Exod. iii. 3).

But out of what motive shall we explain this charge to silence, not to be broken until the Resurrection had found place (cf. Matt. xvi. 20, 21)? Best, perhaps, out of this. The mystery of Christ's sonship should not be revealed to the world, till it was attested beyond all doubt, till He was 'declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead' (Rom. i. 4), and by that Ascension, which was, so to speak, the necessary complement of his Resurrection. It could only be a matter of dispute, and, resting as it did on his miraculous conception, of profane discussion, till then. A little more light upon this point might have increased the guilt of those who rejected and crucified Him; but would not have served to bring them to the obedience of faith.

St. Mark does not merely connect, and bind into one, the two statements of his fellow Evangelists; he also adds what they have wholly passed over, namely, the perplexity which this language of their Lord occasioned them: 'They kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean' (cf. John xx. 9). Not the rising from the dead, but the death which must have gone before, and which could alone render a rising from the dead necessary or possible, it was that which, running counter to all their prejudices and preconceptions, perplexed them so much (Luke xxiv. 22-24; John xii. 24). Yet on this they do not venture to ask any explanation; but on something else closely connected with all which they had just beheld. 'And his disciples asked Him, saying, Why then say the Scribes that Elias must first come?' That momentary glimpse which had been vouchsafed to them of Elias reminded them of the place which he occupied in the economy of salvation (Mal. iv. 5, 6). They had seen him, but only for an instant. That transient glimpse could not satisfy the largeness of prophetic announcements about him. How are they to understand his disappearance, that they are returning with their Master alone? How was this to be reconciled with a cardinal point in the Jewish theology, namely, that Elias should go before the Messiah? nay, how was it reconcilable with their Master's claims to be the Messiah? The reference to what the Scribes said on this matter, leads us to gather that these urged, as a capital and decisive objection against his Messiahship, that no Elias went before Him; while yet the prophecies of the Old Testament had solemnly closed with a pledge that Elias, going before, should prepare the way of the Lord. This stumbling-block to their faith the Scribes may have laid in the way of the disciples. Will their Lord graciously remove it out of their path?

The great Interpreter of prophecy gives right to that interpretation of the prophetic word which the Scribes maintained: 'Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things. But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not, and have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist.' Elias had first come. Whether he had so come in the person of John the Baptist, as that he should not hereafter come in his own, whether the prophecy of Malachi found in him its exhaustive fulfilment, and not a partial and initial one only, is a question than which few in modern times have more divided interpreters ; but one upon which it is unnecessary here to enter, as not immediately belonging to the matter in hand. Enough, that in John the Baptist that word which cannot be broken had found a fulfilment ; whether a further fulfilment awaits it, this still remains to be seen.

9. JAMES AND JOHN OFFERING TO CALL FIRE FROM HEAVEN ON THE SAMA- RITAN VILLAGE.

Luke ix. 51-56.

WE have here one of the memorable incidents of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem: 'And it came to pass, when the time was come that He should be received up, He stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem.' I should prefer to render the second clause of this sentence, 'when the days of his Assumption¹ were fulfilled.' Such a rendering would not lose nor dissolve, as does our present, that word at once so solemn and so sweet, with which the Evangelist mitigates, even as imagination in these things is so potent to mitigate, the bitterness of his Lord's passion and death;

¹ Some understand by our Lord's ἀνάληψις, which is spoken of here, his ready acceptance among men; and make the Evangelist to say that the days of this his acceptance were completed, had now come to an end; which he proceeds to illustrate and to prove by the churlish refusal on the part of the Samaritans to receive Him now, as contrasted with the glad acceptance which He found from them at an earlier date (John iv. 39-42). But this is certainly a mistake. It is true that ἀνάληψις occurs only here in the New Testament, so that its meaning in Scriptural Greek cannot be fixed by a comparison of other passages where it appears; but ἀναλαμβάνεσθαι is the solemn word everywhere employed to express our Lord's taking up into heaven (Mark xvi. 19; Acts i. 2, 11, 22; 1 Tim. iii. 16), and in like manner to express that which was, so to speak, the rehearsal of this, namely, the rapture of Elias in the Old (2 Kin. ii. 10; 1 Macc. ii. 58; Ecolus. xlviii. 9); and in the same sense an apocryphal Jewish book bears the title, 'Ανάληψις Μωϋσῃς. See Suicer, Thes., s. v. ἀνάληψις.

looking on as he thus does to the issue and the end, to the taking up of Christ into heaven, to his reception in his heavenly home and into his Father's glory. In that 'stedfastly set his face'¹ is implied that He addressed Himself to this work, as One whom no threatenings of his adversaries should arrest, no difficulties nor dangers turn away from the accomplishment of his purpose. The disciples at first followed trembling, as we plainly gather from Mark x. 32. He Himself, as there described, 'went before them,' after the manner of some leader who heartens his soldiers by choosing the place of danger for himself.²

'And sent messengers before his face,' probably 'two and two,' as He afterwards sent the Seventy 'into every city and place, whither He Himself would come' (Luke x. 1); and yet, seeing that He was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, not now to prepare his spiritual way, but simply as harbingers, to use that word in its most proper sense. '*And they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready*³ for Him; and they did not receive Him, because his face was as though He would go to Jerusalem.' This refusal of theirs was no piece of ordinary inhospitality, such as the Samaritans were wont to shew to Galilæan pilgrims on their way to the feasts at Jerusalem.⁴ It was not merely as such a

¹ Ἐστήριξε τὸ πρόσωπον: cf. Jer. xxi. 10; Ezek. vi. 1; xxviii. 21. So τάσσειν τὸ πρόσωπον (2 Kin. xii. 17); ἐτοιμάζειν τὸ πρόσωπον (Ezek. iv. 3); ἐφιστάσθαι πρόσωπον (Lev. xvii. 10). But St. Luke makes probably here especial allusion to Isai. l. 7: ἔθηκε τὸ πρόσωπόν μου ὡς σπερεὶν πέτραν.

² More intrepidus ducis, as Grotius puts it well.

³ Ἐτοιμάσαι to which we may supply ξενίαν, this phrase ἐτοιμάζειν ξενίαν, to prepare a lodging, occurring Philem. 22.

⁴ The enmity even to these ordinary pilgrims reached often much further than to a mere refusal of these common rights of hospitality. Josephus (B. J.

pilgrim, that they shut their doors against Him; but this, we must remember, was Christ's solemn progress from Galilee to Judæa as Messiah, with these messengers everywhere announcing Him as such. But, as they esteemed it, a Messiah going to Jerusalem to observe the feasts there, did by this very act proclaim that He was no Messiah; for on Garizim, as they believed, the old Patriarchs had worshipped¹ (John iv. 20), consecrating it to be the holy mountain of God—which therefore, and not Jerusalem, the Christ, when He came, would recognize and honour as the central point of all true religion.

There is no need to suppose John and James to have been themselves the 'messengers,' or harbingers, who endured this repulse. The two sons of Zebedee were more probably with their Lord, formed part of his immediate retinue, at the time when some others brought back the tidings of the village which, refusing to receive Him, had missed the opportunity of entertaining, not angels

ii. 12. 3-7) relates at full the bloody retaliations with which, during the governorship of Quadratus, some of the fiercer sort of the Jews avenged the murder of a Galilæan pilgrim, or of several Galilæan pilgrims, as he states it in another account (Antt. xx. 6. 1), wasting a whole district with a slaughter which spared none, and, as the sons of Zebedee would fain have here done, destroying with fire the villages of these hateful schismatics. The treacherous lyings in wait on the part of the dwellers in Samaria which called forth these bloody revenges will have begun very early, if, as St. Jerome's Hebrew teacher assured him, they were already denounced by the prophet Hosea (vi. 8, 9): Quorum quum intelligentiam quærebam ab Hebræo, ita nobis expositum est. Sacerdotes Bethel, imo fanatici Bethaven, temporibus Paschæ et Pentecostes et Scenopægiæ, quando per Sichem eundum erat ad Hierosolymam, ponebant in itinere latrones, qui insidiarentur pergentibus, ut magis vitulos aureos in Dan et Bethaven quam in Hierosolymis et in templo adorarent Deum. Wetstein (on John iv. 20) gives some specimens from Jewish books of the courtesies by word of mouth which were wont to be exchanged between the Samaritans and the Jewish pilgrims who passed through the land on their way to Jerusalem.

¹ See p. 107.

but the Lord of angels, unawares. Upon this provocation all their suppressed and smouldering indignation against the schismatics in whose territory they were journeying, breaks forth. At this instance of contempt shewn to their Lord and to themselves (for no doubt a feeling of personal slight mingled with their indignation, however little they may have been themselves aware of this), the 'sons of thunder,'—sons of thunder indeed, as Jerome exclaims,¹—will fain play Old Testament parts. They feel that a greater than Elias is here; for they are fresh from the Mount of Transfiguration, where they had seen how the glory of the great prophet of the Old Covenant paled and waned before the brighter glory of Him whom they served, the Lord of the New (ver. 28–36); an outrage therefore against Him, and a rejecting of Him, should therefore be not less terribly avenged.

Out of their sense of this, 'they said, Lord, wilt Thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?' Their allusion is, of course, to the destruction of the two scornful captains with their fifties by the fire which Elijah called down upon them (2 Kin. i. 10, 12). If he spared not those of his own people, should they shrink from executing judgment on heretical Samaritans?² With all of carnal and sinful which mingled with this proposal of theirs, yet what insight into the dignity of their Lord, and the greatness of the outrage which was an outrage against Him, does it reveal; what faith in the mighty powers with which He was able to equip his servants ! How mighty a power this was in the eyes of one of these two is evidenced from the fact that, when in the Apocalypse he records the great wonders and lying signs of the false prophet, the only sign which he specially names is, that 'he maketh fire come down' from heaven on the earth in the sight of men' (Rev. xiii. 13). And yet it might almost seem as though, with all this confidence of theirs, there was a latent and lurking sense upon their part of a certain unfitness in this their proposal; and thus, out of no desire to intrude into their Lord's office, but only out of a feeling that this avenging act might not exactly become Him, they proffer themselves as the executors of the judgment. It will become the servants, though it would not perfectly become the Lord.

¹ And Ambrose: Quid enim mirum, filios tonitruī fulgurare voluisse?

² Jerome (Ad Algas. 5): Si ad servi Eliæ injuriam ignis descendit de cælo, et non Samaritas sed Judæos consumsit incendium, quanto magis ad contemptum Filii Dei in impios Samaritas debet flamma venire?

Already, as would seem, He who was the pattern of a perfect patience had turned to go, that He might seek in another village the hospitality denied Him in this. They meanwhile had lingered behind, loath to leave the guilty village altogether unpunished. But now on this word of theirs, 'He turned,' and turning 'rebuked them: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of'¹ We must beware here of extenuating these words of our Lord, as though 'what manner of spirit' did but signify 'what temper;' so that they might be paraphrased

¹ The emphasis in the English sentence should be on the second 'ye.' The emphatic position of the ὑμεῖς at the end of the sentence, which it would have been hard to reproduce in English, which our Version has not attempted to reproduce, and, indeed, its introduction at all, sufficiently indicates this. Bishop Andrews well: 'Vos is no idle word. It makes a plain separation between them and Elias. You, why you are of my spirit. The disciple and the Master are of one spirit. But if ye be of my spirit, my spirit is in specie columbæ, not aquilæ; not of the eagle that carrieth Jupiter's thunderbolt, but of the dove that brings the olive-branch in her bill.'

thus—‘Ye know not that ye are speaking out of your own hasty passionate temper, being hurt as much by the slight upon yourselves as that put upon Me,¹ even while ye suppose ye are zealous for my glory and for nothing else.’ But ‘spirit’ here means not the spirit of a man; not his own spirit, but rather the spirit of God; and the saying is a far weightier one than such an extenuation of its sense would leave it. ‘You are missing,’ Christ would say, ‘your true position; which is, having been born of the spirit of forgiving love, to be ruled by that spirit, and not by the spirit of avenging righteousness. You are losing sight of the distinction between the Old Covenant and the New, missing the greater glory of the latter, and that it is the higher blessedness to belong to it.’ Thus Hammond rightly: ‘Christ tells them they know not of what spirit they are, that is, they considered not under what dispensation they were.’²

¹ Thus C. a Lapide: Nescitis quis spiritus vos impellat; putatis enim vos a Spiritu Dei agi, cum agamini spiritu humano impatientiae et vindictae.

² The ἐκείνους of the original, expressing as it does a relation of dependence of one upon the other, Augustine (Con. Adimant. 17) gives rightly, cujus spiritus filii estis. This whole clause, οὐκ ὁδοῦσιν οἱ οὐκ ἀρετῆς ἐστὲν ὑμῖν, is wanting, as is well known, in many, indeed in most, of the primary authorities, in A, B, and C, being therefore omitted by Lachmann and Tischendorf. I cannot for all this believe it to have no right to a place in the text. It is found in D, in several early Versions and Fathers; and not to urge, Who could have ventured,—we may confidently ask—Who would have been able, to invent words so exactly touching the central point of the whole matter as these do? This marvellous fitness of theirs seems of itself to preclude the notion of an unauthorized insertion; while, on the other hand, the temptations were many to an unauthorized omission of them. Hastily and superficially regarded, they might seem to favour a Manichean antagonism between the Old Testament and the New, to involve a slight on Elias, as though his spirit was contrary to the spirit of Christ and to that which Christ’s disciples ought to entertain. We know that out of some such feeling as this, the words of the verse preceding, ὡς καὶ Ἐλίας ἐποίησεν, the genuineness of which nobody calls in question, are omitted in some MSS., in the Codex Vaticanus itself. Add to all this that

It behoves us to see clearly that there is no slight cast here on the spirit of Elias. Both spirits, that which breathed through and informed the prophets and saints of the Old Covenant, as well as that which should inform the disciples of the New, are divine.¹ The difference between them is not of opposition, but only of time and of degree. The spirit of the Old Testament was a spirit of avenging righteousness; God was teaching men by terrible things in righteousness his holiness. But the spirit of the New Covenant, not contrary but higher, is that of forgiving love; in it He is overcoming man's evil with his good. There was, indeed, pardoning grace in the Old (Mic. vii. 18; 2 Kin. vi. 21, 22), even as there is avenging justice in the New; fire does come down from God out of heaven and consume his enemies (Rev. xx. 9; cf. xi. 5); in it too 'God is a consuming fire' (Heb. xii. 29); and that same Lord who spake these words shall be Himself revealed in flaming fire to take vengeance on such an abrupt termination as σπαρπεῖς δὲ ἐπερίμνησεν αὐτοῖς is nearly, if not quite, inconceivable. Christ cannot but have put his disciples in a right point of view for understanding the error into which they had fallen. Yet, if we omit this clause, we must then conclude with these words, 'And He turned and rebuked them;' seeing that those which follow, 'for the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them,' do certainly possess no right to a place in the text, having been brought in from Matt. xviii. 11; Luke xix. 20.

¹ The severity of the God of the Old Testament on that occasion, and the lenity of Christ on this, with his distinct refusal to do, or to suffer his servants to do, 'as Elias did,' was one of Marcion's favourite antitheses, or contradictions between the Old Testament and the New, by the aid of which he sought to prove that they could not have come from the same Author. Tertullian (Adv. Marc. iv. 23) replies: Agnosco Judicis severitatem; e contrario Christi lenitatem inorepantis eandem animadversionem destinantes discipulos super istum viculum Samaritarum. Agnoscat et hæreticus ab eodem severissimo Judice promitti hanc Christi lenitatem: Harundinem quassatam non comminuet, et linum fumigans non extinguet. Talls utique multo magis homines non erat crematurus. Nam et tunc ad Heliam, Non in igni (inquit Dominus), sed in spiritu miti.

them that know not God (2 Thess. i. 8); even now severity and goodness go hand in hand.¹ At the same time each economy has one predominating tone, from which it takes its character.²

The two apostles, however, were for the moment failing to recognize this. In a confusion of the Old and the New, in a not knowing of 'what manner of spirit' they were, they had fallen back on the rudiments of God's education of his people, when it was their privilege to go on unto perfection, and to teach the world the far greater might of meekness and of love; even as it is deeply interesting to remember that it was one of these very two who brought somewhat later to the inhabitants of Samaria the perfect gifts of the Holy Ghost (Acts viii. 14; cf. 2 Cor. xiii. 10). They did not understand that there was blood which should speak better things than that of Abel (Heb. xii. 24). The blood of Abel cried well, when it cried for vengeance (Gen. iv. 10), since vengeance, or in other words, the violent restoration of the disturbed balances of justice, is the Lord's (Rom. xii. 19); but the blood of Christ spake even better things, for it spake of pardon and forgiveness, the pardon and forgiveness even of those by whom that blood had been shed. In their missing of all this there was a fault and matter of blame, yet blame by no means so severe as some are disposed to find.¹ They were rebuked for choosing that which, perfectly good in its own time, was only not good now, because a better had come in, for returning to the lower level of the Old Covenant, when Christ had lifted them up to the higher level of the New. I quote from a sermon of Bishop Andrews—it is one of those referred to in the last note: ‘Elias’ spirit, I hope, was no evil spirit. No; but every good spirit, as good as Elias’, is not for every person, place, or time. Spirits are given by God, and men inspired with them, after several manners, upon several occasions, as the several times require. The times sometimes require one spirit, sometimes another. Elias’ time, Elias’ spirit. As his act good, done by his spirit, so his spirit good in his own time. The time changed; the spirit, then good, now not good. But why is it out of time? For “the Son” of man is come. As if He should say, Indeed, there is a time to destroy (Eccles. iii. 3); that was under the law, ignea lex, the fiery law, as Moses calls it; then a fiery spirit would not be amiss. The spirit of Elias was good till the Son of man came, but now He is come, the date of that spirit is expired. When the Son of man is come, the spirit of Elias must be gone; now specially, for Moses and he resigned lately in the Mount. Now no lawgiver, no prophet, but Christ.’

¹ Grotius: Habet quidem et Evangelium sua ultimæ necessitatis tela, quæ in Ananiam Petrus, in Elymam Paulus exercuit; sed usi iis sunt apostoli, ubi nulla esse suspicio poterat iracundiæ semet sub Dei obtentu vindicantis; usi sunt in præfractæ malitiæ homines, quibus nulla species ignorantiae patrocinabatur.

² Augustine (Con. Adim. 17): Nam hæc est brevissima et apertissima differentia duorum Testamentorum, timor et amor. Illud ad veterem, hoc ad novum hominem pertinet; utrumque tamen unius Dei misericordissimæ dispensatione prolatum atque conjunctum.

¹ This incident furnished a favourite text to the English divines of the seventeenth century for sermons on the anniversary of the Gunpowder Treason. Andrews, Jeremy Taylor, Allestree, Tillotson, and many more, have found here their argument. Yet, faulty as the two disciples were, their fire from above resembled so little the fire from beneath which the incendiaries of the Gunpowder Plot would have kindled, that one must needs think they are used somewhat hardly in being brought, with whatever explanations, into any comparison with them.

'And they went to another village;' probably not this time a Samaritan one,¹ and found, as we gather from the narrative, the hospitality there which had been refused them in the first.

¹ It is ἐτέραν, not ἀλλαν.

10. THE RETURN OF THE SEVENTY.

Luke x. 17-20.

SOME have supposed that for the convenience of his narrative St. Luke omits, or rather defers, various intermediate events, and links the return of the Seventy directly with their sending forth. Others, who will not allow that there is any such overpassing of intervening incidents, assume that the return of some at least of their number may have followed closely on their sending forth—so closely that nothing which the sacred historian desired to record happened in the interval. The question is not a very important one, nor is it easy to come to any decision about it. But whether sooner or later, those whom Christ had sent forth, 'returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name.' It will be observed that in his charge to the Seventy (ver. 2-16) our Lord had given them no distinct commission to cast out devils, as He had to the Twelve (Matt. x. 8; Luke ix. 1); but some tentative efforts of theirs, some ventures of faith in this direction, even without distinct authority, had been crowned with success. An acknowledgment that this at once surpassed their commission and their hopes seems to lie in that utterance of theirs, 'Lord, even the devils are subject unto us; not diseases only, over which Thou gavest us power (ver. 9), but the devils as well.

The work, in which a little while ago apostles themselves were foiled (ix. 40), has not lain beyond the limits of our powers, has not baffled us.'

Such exultation was most natural; yet was there in it something of peril for those who entertained it, and for their own spiritual life. One need not exactly affirm that 'through thy name' comes in only as a formal and a saving clause at the end, and that the entire emphasis of the passage lay really on what preceded—'are subject unto us;' ¹ still there may have been something of this; it could scarcely have been otherwise. There is, indeed, nothing more perilous for a man than the first discovery that spiritual powers wait upon his beck, that he too can wield the powers of the world to come; lest he should find in this a motive to self-elation, instead of giving all the glory to God. The disciples at the present moment were exposed to this temptation, as we might conjecture even if we had only these words of theirs; but as is certain, when we put together with these the words of earnest warning which the Lord presently addresses to them (ver. 20), suggesting to them a safer and a truer joy than that which they were now too incautiously entertaining.

Yet while we must needs recognize a certain self-satisfaction and self-elation, which mingles with, and makes itself felt in, this report which they bring back of the successes of their ministry, this will not warrant the interpretation made by some, of Christ's words which follow; 'And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.' Here, they urge, is a warning to the disciples against that sin of pride which their Lord detected in them; as though He had said, 'Be not lifted up; beware of the first beginnings of a sin, which may end in so fearful a catastrophe as that which I once beheld'—beheld, that is, in his preexistent glory and before the world was—the fall, namely, of one through pride even from the height of heaven itself. 'Swift and sudden as the descent of the lightning was that fall, from the highest to the lowest, from a throne of light even to the blackness of darkness for ever. And even such a casting down may be yours, if you forget your humility, and are lifted up in heart.'¹ I cannot so take the words. The warning I believe to be reserved for ver. 20, and that for the present the Lord freely shares in their joy, even as his own presently breaks forth, at these tidings of the great things that they had wrought (ver. 21, 22). Any interpretation of this passage seems to me altogether at fault, which makes it say other than what the Saviour on another occasion said, 'Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out' (John xii. 31), or, 'cast down,' as some read, which would bring that passage into yet closer verbal connexion with this.²

¹ Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. xci.): Redeuntes dixerunt, Domine, ecce dæmonia nobis subjecta sunt. Dixerunt quidem, in nomine tuo; sed ille videt in eis quia in ipsâ glorificatione gaudebant et extollebant se, et ibant inde in superbiam, et ait illis, conservans nomina illorum apud se, Nolite gaudere in hoc; gaudete autem quod nomina vestra sunt scripta in cælis.

¹ So Gregory the Great (Moral. xxiii. 6): Mire Dominus, ut in discipulorum cordibus elationem premeret, innox judicium ruinæ retulit, quod ipse magister elationis accepit; ut in auctore superbiæ discerent, quid de elationis vitio formidarent. Compare Ambrose, De Fugâ Sæc. 7; Bernard, In Ded. Eccles. Serm. v. 6; Stella: Quare Dominus Jesus, ut optimus medicus animarum, ut roboraret sanorum discipulorum animos adversus pestiferum morbum inanitis gloriæ, proponit exemplum Luciferi, qui ob superbiam a tantâ et tam supremâ felicitate dejectus est, quia de donis a Deo acceptis insolenter gloriatus est.

² Káro βληθήσεται, instead of ἐκβληθήσεται: but there is no sufficient reason for disturbing the received reading.

Those who understand the Lord to allude to that great original fall of the 'son of the morning,' anterior to the fall of man, yet do not all accept the words in the same sense. Some make them to contain that warning against pride which has just been mentioned. Others find in them equally a check to the undue elation of the disciples, but from another point of view: 'Think not so much of these petty exorcisms which you have been permitted to achieve.¹ I have seen another sight; the very prince of the whole kingdom of wickedness, and him in whose defeat the defeat of each one of his subordinate ministers was involved, cast out from heaven itself,'—with, of course, the underthought of having been Himself the victorious author of his defeat. The supporters of these expositions commonly urge that no other satisfies the words 'from heaven;' Satan, they say, may at a later moment have fallen into a deeper depth than before, but how fallen 'from heaven' in the days of Christ's flesh? how could He speak in this language of any fall of Satan which He was only now beholding, seeing that long since, at the instant of his first sin, he had been cast out from his first habitation (Jude 6), from his place among the 'sons of God' (Job xxxviii. 7), in the heavenly places? But this difficulty arises from giving an emphasis to the word 'heaven,' which it was not intended to bear, and which in this very chapter there is plain evidence that it need not have; for see ver. 15: 'And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down unto hell.' For the right understanding either of that passage or of this we must dismiss the more solemn use of 'heaven,' in which it signifies the holy place, the more immediate seat and habitation of God and of the blessed spirits, and only associate with the word the notion of elevation and preeminence—so that in fact Christ would be saying here, 'I beheld Satan fall from the high places of his pride and power.'¹

¹ So Theophylact: μη θαυμάζετε εἰ δαίμονες ὑμῖν ὑποτάσσονται· ὁ γὰρ ἄρχων αὐτῶν πάλαι κατέπεσεν ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ· εἰ γὰρ δὲ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις οὐχ ἐωράτο τοῦτο, ἀλλ' οὖν ἐμοὶ ἐθεωρεῖτο τῷ τῶν ἀοράτων θεωρῶν. Ὡς ἀστραπὴ δὲ κατέπεσεν, ἐπεὶ φῶς ἦν, καὶ ἀρχάγγελος, καὶ ἐσπέρρος, εἰ καὶ σκότος γέγονε.

What this fall of his might mean, and what the subjection of the devils to the Seventy had to do with it, may presently be considered; but it will be desirable first to confirm this interpretation of 'heaven' here by one or two further quotations. We have then in Isai. xiv., the description of the fall of the king of Babylon, typifying as he does a mightier enemy of the Church of God; and there the prophet exclaims, 'How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!' (ver. 12); and if it be urged that 'from heaven' is a figure there, justified and explained by the comparison of the king to the morning star, it may be rejoined that there is quite as much justification in the comparison of Satan here to the lightning. Then, too, at Ephes. vi. 12, the warfare of the faithful is declared at this present time to be with 'spiritual wickedness in high places,' or, as it might be still more accurately translated, 'in heavenly places' (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις), which can only mean, as our Translators have rightly understood it, in high seats of authority. And then further, the passage in Rev. xii. 7–11, 'There was war in heaven,' is referred by all good expositors to that destroying of the works of the devil which was the consequence of the triumphant life and death and ascension of the Son of God. There is described in its full consummation that which the Lord here with prophetic eye has already beheld.

¹ Compare Cicero (Phil. ii. 42): Collegam de celo detraxisti,—robbed him, that is, of the splendour and honour which before were his.

But if Christ be not here speaking of that original fall of Satan, in which he left his first habitation, but rather, as I am persuaded, of some fall within the fall, some present dejection of Satan from those seats of his power and his pride, which during the four thousand years of his domination he had reared and constructed anew, and from which he was now being thrust out again—what reason, it may be asked, had the Lord for in spirit beholding this at the present moment? These few and petty exorcisms, were they not far too slight and insignificant a matter to justify so magnificent a saying? Assuredly, if contemplated as the efficient cause of that fall; but not, if seen as its evidences and accompaniments. As Christ drew proofs of a victory over Satan, which must have been accomplished by Himself, from his own expelling of devils (Matt. xii. 28, 29), so He found proofs of the same victory in like works done by his disciples. The power of the strong man could not but indeed be broken, when not merely the Stronger Himself could spoil his goods at his pleasure, but the very weaklings among his servants could go in and out of his domain, and do there at their will.¹ The Lord in no way links the headlong and shameful fall of Satan from on high with what they had wrought, as if that had anything to do with effecting it. That fall, that new stripping him of so large a part of the power and strength which he still retained, was the fruit of the Incarnation, of the life and death and exaltation of the Son of man.

¹ Corn. a Lapide: Non novam mihi rem narratis, nam cum vos nuper mitterem ad evangelizandum videbam dæmonem suâ potestate a me privatum quasi de cælo cadere, ac per vos magis casurum.

But this new triumph of the kingdom of good over the kingdom of evil in their respective heads, which Christ evermore in the spirit saw, at certain moments of his life He realized with intenser vividness than at others. And this moment of the return of the Seventy was one of these solemn and festal moments of his life. He employs the imperfect tense (ἐθεωροῦν), to make clear that He had foreseen the glorious issue even when He sent them forth. This which they now announce to Him is even as He had surely expected: 'I saw, as I sent you forth, Satan fall like lightning from heaven.' Already He beheld the whole idol-worship of the heathen world, whereof Satan was the soul and informing principle (1 Cor. x. 20), giving way, its splendour departing, its oracles dumb, its temples forsaken—till, instead of riding on the high places of the earth, and claiming the homage of the great and noble and learned of the world, it should creep into obscure corners, and after surviving awhile as the despised superstition of 'pagans' or villagers, expire altogether. This and much more of the same kind, the putting down of how many of the enormous wickednesses of the world, the casting down of how many strongholds of evil, was implied in the power which his disciples put forth. Seeing the greatest in the least, He saw a pledge of the great exorcism of the heathen world in these slighter cures which his disciples had been strong to effect.

He proceeds: 'Behold, I give you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy, and nothing shall by any means hurt you.' The reading, 'I have given you,' arose from a misunderstanding of the passage. Hitherto He had not given them this power; they indeed, as we have seen, had in faith anticipated some portion of it; and He, finding they were the men to make the right use of it, now imparts it to them in all its fulness, according to that law of his kingdom, 'To him that hath shall be given.' In the form of the promise there is manifest allusion to Ps. xci. 13; perhaps also to Isai. xi. 8;¹ and, whether directly so intended or not, we may certainly recognize here a very gracious reading backward and reversing of a threatening made under the elder Covenant, 'Behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the Lord' (Jer. viii. 17). The physical consequences of man's sin, which may be traced through all regions of lower life, do in the animal world concentrate themselves with an especial malignity in the poisonous adder, in the stinging scorpion; which therefore are fitly used as the symbols and representatives of all that has most power and most will to hurt and to harm; of all forms of deadliest malice exercised by Satan and his servants against the faithful (Ezek. ii. 6). Amid all this deadliest malice of the enemy they should go, themselves unharmed; and, shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace, should tread it all under their feet: 'and nothing shall by any means hurt you.' And yet, while we thus transfer, and rightly, the serpent and scorpion into the region of spiritual wickedness, and see here a pledge and promise that the faithful should be kept from the powers of evil, we must not so exclusively do this as to leave out a literal fulfilment as well; such as found place when St. Paul shook the viper from his hand (Acts xxviii. 5), when St. John, if that indeed was so, drank of the poison-cup; and in this respect the passage contains the promise of the same character as that made by the Lord after his resurrection (Mark xvi. 18).

¹ Compare the παύσιον ὄφιον (LXX.) there with the ὄφις of ver. 21.

But with the enlarged commission, for it is 'all the power of the enemy' which it is now given them to prevail against, comes also, and as I believe comes for the first time in this discourse, the word of warning: 'Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven.' They were not forbidden altogether to rejoice in these mighty powers as exercised by them, forbidden only to make them the chiefest matter of their joy. The reason is obvious. These a man might possess, and yet remain unsanctified still (Matt. vii. 22, 23; 1 Cor. xiii. 2); these at best were only the privilege of a few, not therefore of the essence of a Christian's joy. There was that in which they might rejoice with a joy which should not separate them from any, the least of their brethren, a joy which they had in common with all.¹ There was that in which they might rejoice without fear, namely, in the eternal love of God, who had so loved as to ordain them unto everlasting life. This mention of 'names written in heaven' (cf. Isai. iv. 3; Heb. xii, 23, 'the Church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven') is the nearest allusion to 'the book of life,' 'the Lamb's book of life,' 'the book of God,' 'the book of the living,' or simply 'the book,' which anywhere occurs in the Gospels; but the image is one which elsewhere runs through all Scripture (Exod. xxxii. 32, 33; Ps. lxix. 29; Dan. xii. 1; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8; xx. 12; xxi. 27). It expresses under an image what St. Paul expresses without one, where he speaks of God's eternal purposes of love toward his saints (Ephes. i. 4, 5).

¹ Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. cxxx.): Redierunt apostoli, et dixerunt Domino, cum missi essent a Domino, Ecce, Domine, in nomine tuo etiam dæmōnia nobis subjecta sunt. Vidit Dominus quod tentaret eos superbia ex potentiā miraculorum; et ille, qui medicus venerat sanare tumores nostros, continuo ait, Nolite in hoc gaudere, quia dæmōnia vobis subjecta sunt, sed gaudete quia nomina vestra scripta sunt in cælo. Non omnes Christiani boni dæmōnia ejiciunt; omnium tamen nomina scripta sunt in cælo. Non eos voluit gaudere ex eo quod propriū habebant, sed ex eo quod cum ceteris salutem tenebant. Inde voluit gaudere apostolos, unde gaudes et tu.

The Lord has administered, where He saw this was needed, a wholesome rebuke to that pride, of which He detected the germs in his disciples; but this does not hinder Him from rejoicing in this new victory of the kingdom of light over the kingdom of darkness,—a matter of the greater joy, that it was these 'babes' by whose hands this victory had been won: they of the household were dividing the spoil. 'In that hour Jesus rejoiced¹ in spirit, and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight.' Precisely the same words with a slightly different introduction occur at Matt. xi. 25, 26; where they cannot possibly be the record of the same discourse; for they have the same perfect fitness there as here; they are embedded in one narrative quite as deeply as in the other. A careful comparison of the two passages can, I think, leave no doubt on our minds that Christ did from time to time repeat Himself in nearly or quite the same words; which, after all, is not at all so wonderful in Him, each of whose utterances being perfect, could never be changed for the better.

¹ The forms ἀγαλλιάω (for ἀγάλλω), and ἀγαλλίασις, belong to sacred Greek exclusively, being found only in the New Testament, the Septuagint, and in writings dependent upon these; ἀγαλλίαμα, which is also found in the Septuagint, does not occur in the New Testament. Ἀγαλλιᾶσθαι is often in the New Testament joined with χαίρειν, as at Matt. v. 12; Rev. xix. 7; cf. Tob. xiii. 13; in the Septuagint oftener with εὐφραίνεισθαι. It is stronger than χαίρειν, for this last may be in spirit and with no external manifestations; but ἀγαλλιᾶσθαι, is to exult, so to rejoice as with outward tokens to testify the inward joy, as an old expositor, Stella, here puts it well: Non est intelligendum quod antea in gaudio interiori non fuerit, sed interioris gaudii quædam signa nunc exterius demonstravit; ideo convenientissime dixit, Exultavit. Exultatio namque dicitur quasi extra se saltatio, quando videlicet ex abundantia gaudii interioris signa lætitiæ foras erumpunt.

The all-important character of that which He is uttering here may well explain its repetition; setting, as He does, his seal to that word of the prophet, 'Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight' (Isai. v. 21; cf. Prov. iii. 5, 7), and, be it observed, not merely thanking God for what He has revealed, but for what He has hidden, that the same things, revealed by Him to some, were by Him hidden from others. There is then, if these words mean aught, such a thing as a punitive hiding and a penal blindness. The hand of the Lord may be upon those who withstand the truth, so that they shall not be able to see the sun of righteousness (Acts xiii. 11). That there are those from whom God hides his truth in displeasure may be a very terrible fact; but a fact may be very terrible, and yet true notwithstanding; and here is one of which we can only get rid by dealing the most violent with this and with other plainest statements of Scripture (Isai. vi. 10; Matt. xiii. 11-15; Luke xix. 42; John ix. 39). Christ here thanks his Father for two things, first, that He has hidden from the wise and prudent; and, secondly, that what He has hidden from them He has revealed to babes; the hiding and revealing being recognized by Him as alike his Father's work, and the judgment and the grace alike matters for which He renders thanks. The words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 26-29, supply a remarkable parallel to this whole saying; while the early history of the Church, from which Scribes and Pharisees, the Gamaliels, and all or nearly all of the disputers of this world, stood aloof, fishermen meanwhile and publicans, and men ignorant and unlearned, finding their place therein, furnishes the best commentary.

11. THE PHARISEES SEEKING TO SCARE THE LORD FROM GALILEE.

Luke xiii. 31-33.

THE Lord lingers too long in Galilee; so, at least, to his adversaries it seems. He is there comparatively secure among his friends and adherents; every day adding to the number of these; confirming his word by signs following (Matt. xv. 28; John iv. 46); his reputation growing; all men holding Him for a prophet (Matt. viii. 27; ix. 8, 33); so that He will hardly be reached by the extremest malice of his foes. Gladly would these scare Him from the shelter of that safe retreat into the toils which have been set for Him at Jerusalem (Mark xi. 18; Matt. xxi. 46). And even if they do not quite succeed in this, it will be something if they can deliver themselves from his unwelcome presence in Galilee, at the same time involving Him in the discredit of an ignoble flight. It was that if possible, this at any rate, which they proposed to themselves, when they made to Him the communication which follows.

'The same day there came certain of the Pharisees'—came, no doubt with a friendly and confidential mien, and as men to whom, whatever secondary differences might exist between them, his safety was dear,—'saying unto Him, Get Thee out, and depart hence, for Herod will kill Thee. The words curiously remind us of another similar plot and intrigue, by which it was sought, and equally in vain, to terrify a prophet of the Old Covenant from the appointed sphere of his labours; Jeroboam playing there the part of Herod here; Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, of the Pharisees; and the prophet Amos sustaining there the part which our Lord sustains here. There too Amaziah, with apparently no unfriendly meaning, although he had just before denounced the overbold prophet to the king (had the Pharisees done the same in the present instance?), came to Amos, saying, 'O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there; but prophesy not again any more at Bethel, for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court' (Amos vii. 10-17; cf. Isai. xxx. 10, 11). As the Pharisees here, so the priest of the Calves there takes nothing by his move, but goes utterly baffled and defeated away.

We may affirm, with tolerable certainty, that Herod Antipas entertained no such design of killing Jesus as by these Pharisees is ascribed to him here. He had enough of prophet's blood on his hands in the murder of John the Baptist, and can scarcely have wished to have more. A weak, frivolous, unworthy prince, yet he is nowhere charged in Scripture with seeking to compass the Lord's death. Even the crime of the Baptist's death, who came into far more direct collision with him, he had been entangled in unawares. When he heard of the fame of the Lord, he satisfied himself with saying to his servants, 'This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him' (Matt. xiv. 2); he devises no plots of open or secret violence against Him. The report of Christ's miracles appears to have excited his curiosity (for his doctrine he cared nothing), so that when Pilate sent Jesus to him, 'he was exceeding glad, for he was desirous to see Him of a long season, and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him' (Luke xxiii. 8); but it is plain, both from this account and from his conduct in sending the Lord back unharmed to Pilate, with nothing worthy of death done to Him (Luke xxiii. 15), that he had no enmity against Him for the past, nor fear of Him for the future. We may say, further, that had he cherished that murderous thought in his heart which the Pharisees impute to him, 'that fox' is not the style with which he would have been characterized by the lips of truth; but if the Lord had been pleased to designate him with any title of the kind, He would have styled him 'that wolf,' or 'that leopard,' by the name of some animal, of which bloodthirstiness, and not cunning, is the prevailing feature. Add to all this, that if Herod had been known really to entertain such designs, the Pharisees, who were now in deadliest conflict with the Lord, would have been the last to warn Him of his danger, or in any way to assist Him in escaping from the snares which were being laid for his life.

The only point upon which it is possible to raise a question seems to me to be this, namely, whether this was a gratuitous invention on the part of the Pharisees, suggested possibly by some flying rumours, to which, however, they gave no credit themselves, of Herod's ill-will to Christ—such rumours as the Baptist's murder might easily have occasioned; whether the tale they bring was thus a mere invention of their own, devised with the purpose of terrifying the Lord from those quarters; or whether they and Herod understood one another, and he, possibly disquieted at this period by the growing number of Christ's adherents, may have been willing to use their assistance, and to allow them to use the terror of his name, so to induce the Lord quietly to withdraw to some other part of the land.

Those who are disposed to see an understanding here between Herod and the Pharisees, urge that in the words of Christ's reply, 'Go ye, and tell that fox,' there is an intimation that such a collusion existed, and that it had not escaped Him. They professed to be his friends, and to bring Him this warning out of goodwill, and meaning to defeat the purpose of Herod; but sending them to him with that message, the Lord will imply that He perfectly apprehends the relation in which they and Herod stand to one another—how that Herod was waiting to learn from their lips the success of their stratagem, and the spirit in which He Himself had received that announcement which they brought: 'This is my answer to him that sent you, whose emissaries you have condescended to become—to that fox, who thinks with his paltry wiles and transparent devices to scare the lion from his own domain.'

Yet I cannot but believe that their view is a truer one, the many interpreters, ancient and modern, who have seen in this report which the Pharisees bring to Jesus a pure invention of their own, a fiction wholly of their own devising. They did but pretend the malice of Herod, who, if he had desired to rid himself of the Lord's presence, had other means at his command; and who certainly was on no such friendly terms with the Pharisees as to make very probable any understanding between them.

Nor need the words, 'Go ye, and tell that fox,' cause any difficulty here. The Lord, in that spirit of finest irony which is not alien from the spirit of deepest love and loftiest truth, so far fell in with, or seemed to fall in with, the aspect of the matter which they presented to Him, and to be deceived by it, that He used its language—not at the same time failing to let them perceive that their wretched covert intrigues were open and manifest to Him. The 'fox' was really in their own hearts, and to this 'fox' He indeed addresses Himself.¹ Some of the early interpreters ingeniously urge in this sense the words 'this fox,' as one actually present, rather than 'that fox,' one at a distance,² which might have beforehand been expected. If there be anything in this, our Version has not preserved it, and the Vulgate as little.³ It was they, the Pharisees, who were themselves offended at his continued presence in the land; it was to their own selves they should indeed carry the message back. This explanation has the further advantage, that so the decorum which our Lord ever preserved in regard of the powers that be, however unworthy were those who might actually represent them at the time, will be perfectly maintained; which decorum might seem violated, if the message were really intended for Herod, and not rather to stop short with these intriguing Pharisees themselves.

But the reply which they were to carry back to 'that fox,' in other words, to accept themselves, is not without a certain amount of obscurity: '*Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow,*¹ and the third day I shall be perfected.' The general meaning of the answer is not hard to catch: 'So far from being interrupted in my-ministry by any tidings of the kind you bring, be they false or true, by your wish, or by Herod's wish, to be rid of my presence at once, I shall proceed on my way, I shall do as before I have done, I shall put forth my beneficent powers, casting out devils, healing the sick for the present ('to-day'), for the future ('to-morrow'), and only at a remoter period ('the third day') will my life and course reach their appointed term.'² The words are exactly parallel to others spoken on not a very dissimilar occasion, when his timid disciples would have dissuaded Him from affronting the dangers of Judæa; to whom He replied: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world' (John xi. 9; cf. ix. 4). 'To-day and to-morrow and the third day' will here exactly correspond to the 'twelve hours' there, signifying as they do a certain fixed appointed time. Not of necessity a very brief time, but rather the contrary; for an intention upon his part to make his further sojourn in Galilee a brief one was exactly that which the Pharisees would have been best pleased to hear, while it was very far from his purpose at all to gratify them by the announcement which He made.¹ Least of all do these words signify—which would be a meaning utterly trivial—that the time of his actual tarrying in Galilee should extend over two literal days, and that on the third He should quit it, even as the verse following can as little mean that He would occupy three such actual days in the journey from that spot to Jerusalem. What He says is this: ‘There is for Me a predetermined time, during which I shall labour unhindered. No malice nor intrigues of my enemies shall prevail to abridge that time.’² Instead of fleeing, as you suggest, I will leisurely accomplish my work this day and to-morrow; and then when the third day comes I shall be perfected, I shall finish my course: the things concerning Me will have an end; which, however’ (for all this is implied in the word), ‘shall be no abrupt nor premature one, cutting off my life in the midst of my days, with my work unfinished, in an obscure corner of a remote province; but a death which shall be the solemn and fit conclusion of my life, the completion and consummation of all which I came into the world to accomplish.’³

¹ Maldonatus: Christus non Herodem, sed Pharisæos ipsos qui Herodem sibi minabantur, vulpem appellavit. Non quod hæc verba de Herode non dixerit, sed quod in personâ Herodis, quam illi sibi induebant ut ipsum deterrent, eos notaverit atque refellerit.

² Thus Theophylact: οὐ γὰρ εἶπε, τῇ ἀλώπεκι ἐκείνῃ, ἀλλὰ ταύτῃ.

³ We have 'that fox,' the Vulgate, 'vulpi illi.'

¹ Σήμερον καὶ αὔριον: cf. Josh. xx. 18, 28; and for a similar method of counting backward to the third day, Susan. 15.

² Cajetan: Per hodie et cras et tertiam diem universi temporis requisiti ad opus suum perfectio significatur. Calvin: Hodie et cras defungar munere mihi divinitus injuncto; ubi ad finem stadii ventum fuerit, tunc in sacrificium offerar. There is frequently a certain solemnity about this indication of the third day; such as is scarcely wanting here; thus see Gen. xxii. 4; xxxi. 22; xxxiv. 25; xl. 20; xlii. 18; Exo^d. xix. 11, 16; 1 Kin. xii. 12; 2 Kin. xx. 5;

¹ Maldonatus: Non id agebat Christus, ut Pharisæos consolaretur; quod profecto fecisset, si illis significasset brevi se post tempore moriturum. Quid enim erat quod illi magis optarent? sed volebat potius augere materiam invidiæ atque doloris.

² Stella: Fallimini, si creditis vos aut Herodes quod versutia humana possit aliquid contra potentiam Dei et ejus voluntatem. Vos dicitis quod Herodes mortem mihi molitur, et vos non moleste fertis; sed inanis est deliberatio ejus, quia non est in manu ejus mors mea, quia nemo tollet animam meam a me. Potestatem enim habeo ponendi animam meam, et sic cum voluero ponam eam et moriar.

³ To make τελειοῦμαι a middle verb, completing it with τὰ ἔργα, and finding as the meaning, ‘on the third day I finish,’ i.e. ‘my works,’ sadly mars the force of this passage. It is not for nothing that the two active verbs which go before are exchanged for this passive. Our English, ‘I shall be perfected,’ is very good; a vast improvement on ‘I make an end,’ of the earlier

There may seem a slight contradiction between the statement of the verse which has just been considered, and of that which now follows: 'Nevertheless,¹ I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following;' for here the Lord speaks of 'the third day' as one of the days of his walking, while there He contemplated it as the day on which He should be perfected and finish his course. But there is no real contradiction. He contemplates his death as being, in fact, the crowning work of his life. As little does this verse 33 contain a mere repetition of the statement of that which went before. Hitherto He has but stated the fact that his ministry should continue; now He is giving the grounds in the divine order and fitness of things why it should continue, why He should walk and work unlet and unhindered. 'This my death here in this remote Galilee, with which you threaten Me, is impossible; for it can not be that a prophet, and therefore least of all He who is the chief of the prophets, perish out of Jerusalem. That city which Versions, as is also the Vulgate, Consummor. Compare, for similar uses of τελευτῶσαι, Phil. iii. 12; Acts xx. 24; Heb. v. 9; xii. 23. More than once Augustine transfers this word from Christ to Christ's Church, and finds in it a prophecy of the three stages of the spiritual life through which He causes it in each of its members to pass, namely, the forgiveness of sins, the restoration to health, the consummation in glory; thus Con. Jul. Pelag. vi. 19: Ecce, inquit, ejicio dæmonia, et sanitates perficio hodie et cras, et tertiâ die consummor. Expulsio quippe est dæmoniorum remissio peccatorum; perfectio sanitatum, quæ fit proficiendo post baptismum; tertia consummatio est, quam suæ quoque carnis immortalitate monstravit, incorruptibilium beatitudo gaudiorum. Cf. Enarr. in Ps. cx. 46.

¹ What the exact force of this 'Nevertheless' (πλὴν) is, expositors have often not troubled themselves to consider; it seems to me best given by Maldonatus, whose commentary on the whole of this difficult passage is masterly: Refertur non ad omnia præcedentia, sed ad illud tantum ultimum, et tertiâ die consummor, quasi dicat quamvis tertiâ die moriturus sim, tamen interim nemo me impedire poterit, quominus hoc intermedio tempore miracula faciam.

has been the murderess of all the prophets from the beginning (Isai. i. 21), which has ever claimed this dreadful prerogative to herself, as she is chief in favours, to be also chief in guilt, she shall not forego it now ; she shall continue to the end the seat of all the deadliest enmity to the kingdom of God.' But the words reach much further than this, much further than to the stating merely of such a general fact as this. They have a direct reference to those with whom the Lord is speaking now, and contain the finest irony on their affected interest in his welfare. 'You have come, expressing your alarm for my safety, should I tarry longer here. You may lay aside your apprehensions. My danger is not in Galilee, nor yet from Herod. I shall not perish here, but in Jerusalem, your seat, your head-quarters, where you reign supreme. When the day of my death, or of my consummation, arrives, you, and not Herod, will be the authors of the murderous deed.'¹

¹ Calvin: Vosne ut ab Herode mihi caveam monetis, quos video meos fore carnifices!

12. THE UNFINISHED TOWER AND THE DEPRECATED WAR.

Luke xiv. 25-33.

OUR Lord on more than one occasion during his earthly ministry found a multitude in his train; loosely attached to Him; but who at the same time would inevitably have detached themselves from Him and fallen away, so soon as ever a day of temptation had arrived. Nothing could be further from his desire than such a following as this. 'They that are with Him are called and faithful and true' (Rev. xvii. 14); and such will abide with Him unto the end. But not so these; to whom therefore He turned, and spake words repelling rather than inviting. They who in this world would enlist recruits keep out of sight what is hard, painful, and dangerous in the work to which they invite them; but not so He, who desired that none should join themselves to Him without a clear knowledge beforehand of all to which they were engaging themselves. To a Paul, on the very threshold of his conversion, He will shew what great things he must suffer for his name's sake (Acts ix. 16). Ezekiel at his first commission is told plainly to what manner of men, such as could be likened only to thorns, briars, scorpions, he is sent (Ezek. ii. 6). And to this multitude Christ addressed one of his hard sayings—one after the hearing of which we can hardly doubt that many went back and walked no more with Him (cf. John vi. 66). A sad consummation, yet better far than that they should throw in their lot with Him, afterwards to be offended, and to fall from Him, in that day of trial which was sure before long to arrive (Matt. xiii. 21).

We read then that 'there went great multitudes with Him; and he turned, and said unto them, If any man come to Me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' Let us here notice, by the way, the profound confidence in a guiding, interpreting Spirit who should be ever at work in his Church, which these words of Christ reveal. Take them literally, and they stand in direct contradiction to the whole teaching of the rest of Scripture, in contradiction to the teaching of Moses, of the prophets, of the apostles, of Christ Himself; they enjoin an immorality; require of men to hate those whom it is their prime duty to love. And yet Christ spake the words notwithstanding, satisfied to leave to that interpreting Spirit to put them in harmony with all which elsewhere is commanded in the Scripture, or written by the finger of God on the heart of man.

But in other ways also the unparalleled boldness of Christ's teaching, the tremendous claims which He makes on those who offer to join themselves to Him, may well fill us with marvel and with awe. How intolerable the pride and presumption of any less than the greatest, lower than the highest, to impose the conditions of discipleship which He here imposes, to demand of men the sacrifices which He here demands; and this, be it observed, not in the name of One whose messenger He is; but in his own; standing forth as Himself the object, to whom all this measureless devotion of all men is justly due, who, claiming it all, claims nothing but his own. When I ask myself what are the proofs of Christ's divinity which the Scripture affords, when I enquire whether He did Himself there claim to be God, I find evidence of this not so much in a certain number of texts where this in as many words is asserted—though these are most needful—but far more in the position toward every other man which He uniformly, and as a matter of course, assumes. What man, that was not man's Maker as well as his fellow, could have required that father and mother, wife and children, should all be postponed to him; that, where any competition between his claims and theirs arose, He should be everything and they nothing? that not merely these, which, though very close to a man are yet external to him, but that his very self, his own life, should be hated, when on no other conditions Christ could be loved. It is nothing strange or unreasonable that man's Creator, the author of his being, the supreme and absolute Good, should demand all this of his creatures (Exod. xxxii. 27; Deut. xxxiii. 9); but that Jesus of Nazareth should challenge the same unreserved devotedness on the part of all men, should require that every other duty of every other man should yield to the duty to Him, that every other love should subordinate itself to the love of Him; how could this be, except as He also stood in the place of God, and was God? .

But these are thoughts which, followed out as they deserve, would lead us too far from the subject immediately in hand. Christ has spoken of the absolute renunciation of all, even of a man's own life, that last citadel of selfishness, as he who ought best to know, had long since proclaimed (Job ii. 4), that citadel, where it may still make itself strong when every outwork has been abandoned¹—He has spoken of this as the condition without which no man could be his disciple. But this self which needs to be renounced is oftentimes a very subtle one, the self of him who proposes to serve God, but to serve Him in his own strength, and not in God's; who may have renounced much, but has not renounced a vain confidence in his own powers, and that these will enable him to carry to a successful end a service thus undertaken. Christ uses two similitudes, borrowed from two enterprizes, the one grave to a private man, the other even to a king; by aid of the first He warns us of the shameful close which may attend a service in this spirit begun; while in the second He points out to all the only wise course for the avoiding of such perils as would thus lie before them. This is the first: 'For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish.' And this the second: *'Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace.'*²

¹ As Gregory the Great here says well (Hom. xxxii.): Nec tamen sufficit nostra relinquere, nisi relinquamus et nos.

² Ἐν δέκα χιλιάσιν. See for the same idiom, indeed for exactly the same words, 1 Macc. iv. 29; and with the συμβαλεῖν εἰς πόλεμον compare συμβαλεῖν εἰς μάχην, Josephus, Antt. vi. 5. 2.

The comparison of the Christian life, sometimes that of the individual, sometimes that of the collective Church, to the carrying up of a building is frequent in Scripture (Matt. vii. 24-27; Ephes. ii. 20-22; 1 Cor. iii. 9; 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5); and not less frequent the likening of it to the waging of a war (1 Cor. xvi. 13; 1 Thess. v. 8; Ephes. vi. 11-17; 2 Tim. ii. 3, 4; iv. 7). But the fitting in of these words to their place here, the making them to illustrate the matter directly in hand, is not so easy as is often carelessly taken for granted. Indeed the current interpretation of this passage is far from satisfactory; and we have only to look a little closely at it to perceive the very serious difficulties with which it is encumbered. I believe, indeed, that by that interpretation words among the most profound and far reaching which our Lord spake upon earth, are made to take comparatively a slight and trivial meaning. That interpretation may be stated as follows. Christ would have the candidates for admission within the circle of his disciples to consider diligently with themselves, and accurately to weigh, whether they have strength and means to carry them triumphantly through the arduous enterprize which they meditate; and if, as the result of this calculation, they discover that they have not, then to renounce the enterprize altogether; and not, as some foolish builder, to begin the tower of the Christian life, which they will prove unable to carry to the end; like some rash king to challenge to the conflict powers, the powers, that is, of the kingdom of darkness, which are twice as strong as they are, with which therefore they cannot hope to wage a successful war.

This explanation labours under a double defect. In the first place, according to all the other teaching of Scripture, the disciple who indeed builds and completes the tower, is not one who has counted the cost, and found that he has sufficient; he whose warfare is crowned with victory is not he who has calculated the opposing forces, and found that those at his command are more and mightier than any which can be brought against him; but he rather who, having counted the cost, has found that he has not enough, that the outlay far exceeds any resources at his command, that he begins and must continue a bankrupt to the end; having nothing in himself, that so he may possess all things in God; who, having taken the measure of his own forces and of those of the adversary, has understood that this warfare is one not to be waged at his own charges, has learned to cry, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' and sought to a mightier for aid. All other Scripture teaches us, in the glorious words of Charles Wesley's hymn, to be 'strong in self-despair,' and not in self-confidence; that emptiness is indeed the one condition of fulness; that, however sad a thing it may be in this world to end with being a bankrupt, in the spiritual world it is the best thing which can happen to begin with being such; a man's poverty being there his riches, and his weakness his strength; for such are the strange paradoxes of the kingdom of heaven.

This is one blemish—a most serious one; but there is another behind. Granting that this objection could be set aside, is it conceivable that Christ should counsel in such a case, and having made such a discovery, not so much as to begin the too costly tower;¹ or, more marvellous still, not so much as to provoke the too potent foe, but on the contrary, to make terms with him, to engage not to molest him, if he will not molest us, whom to defy to the uttermost is our first duty and only safety (1 Pet. v. 9; Ephes. vi. 11-16), whose works to destroy was once the work of Christ in his own person, will be his work through his Church to the end? What sort of peace would that be? Can we imagine that the Lord would give the allowance of his word to such abject resolves as these? for what, after all, are they who leave off to build, who, in place of challenging, make conditions with the enemy, but the Demases who forsake not Paul only, but Paul's Lord; having loved the present world; who, when tribulation comes or even threatens, straightway are offended and fall away; who see the wolf coming and flee? 'The fearful' of Rev. xxi. 8, the traditores, the thurificati, of early Church history, all these did in that sense count the cost, and gave over to build; having challenged the king of the dark kingdom, shrunk from meeting him in battle. But can we suppose that Christ had a word of allowance for these? that they could plead that they were acting on his advice? and yet, adopting the common interpretation, how could we avoid so doing?

But it is not so. These sayings of our Lord contain a far other lesson than this, one in far closer harmony with the other teaching of Scripture. What that teaching is, the words with which Christ follows up and applies all which He has here said, sufficiently declare: 'So like- wise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.' In that 'forsaketh' (ἀπορῶσεται), or 'renounces,' 'bids good by to,' 'takes farewell of,' lies the key to the whole passage. Christ sees the multitudes addressing themselves to his discipleship with one kind of furniture and apparatus for it; such as He knows will utterly fail them, when the stress of the trial comes; He warns them of their need of quite another. It is the poor, those who, counting up their means, discover that they have not enough to carry through the work, and that of their own they never will have enough, and who therefore renounce all that they have, it is these, and not the rich, not, that is, they who walk in a vain conceit of their own riches (Rev. iii. 17), who are able to finish this tower.¹ How it fares with the others, what a swift and shameful coming to the end of all their fancied resources inevitably awaits them, this Christ puts vividly before our eyes in the words which follow (ver. 29, 30). He gathers up in these the world's judgment upon them who, professing to forsake it, were yet of it all the while, and who sooner or later reveal that they were so. The world cannot pardon that they should ever have affected any higher service than its own; and even while it receives back its prodigals, receives them with taunt and with scorn; the salt which has lost its savour is trodden under foot, not of God, but, doom more ignominious far, is trodden under foot of men (Matt. v. 13). Nor are worldly and wicked men the only mockers. The scorers here include, as more than one in olden time has urged, not these men only, well pleased when any scheme of higher service, which threatened to put them and their lives to rebuke, has come to nought; but fallen spirits as well, the angels to whom men are a spectacle (1 Cor. iv. 8); who, so far as they can rejoice in aught, rejoice in dishonour done to God; and who, being first our tempters, are afterwards, when we have yielded to their temptations, our mockers and scorers as well:¹ ‘This man’ (the contempt makes itself still more felt in the original), ‘began to build, and was not able to finish.’

¹ As Maldonatus asks well, who sees the difficulty, but not the way out of it, Deinde quomodo nos Christus dehortaretur ne Christiani efficeremur?

¹ Gregory the Great (Hom. 37): Hoc enim inter terrenum et cæleste ædificium distat, quod terrenum ædificium expensas colligendo construitur, cæleste vero ædificium expensas dispergendo. Ad illud sumtus facimus, si non habita colligamus; ad istud sumtus facimus, si et habita relinquamus.

Such uncompleted buildings, open to all the winds and rains of heaven, with their naked walls, and with all which has been spent upon them utterly wasted, are called in the language of the world, which has often so true a word, This man’s, or that man’s, Folly; arguing as they do so utter a lack of wisdom and prevision on their parts who began them. Such, for example, is Charles the Fifth’s palace at Granada, the Kattenburg at Cassel. They that would be Christ’s disciples shall see to it that they present no such Babels to the ready scorn of the scornful; beginning, as though they intended to take heaven by storm, to build up a tower which should reach even thither, and anon coming to an end of all their resources, of all their zeal, all their patience, and leaving nothing but an utterly baffled purpose, the mocking-stock of the world, even as those builders of old left nothing but a shapeless heap of bricks to tell of the entire miscalculation which they had made. Making mention of ‘a tower,’ I cannot but think that the Lord intended an allusion to that great historic tower, the mightiest failure and defeat which the world has seen, that tower of Babel, which, despite of its vainglorious and vaunting beginning, ended in the shame and confusion of all who undertook it (Gen. xi. 1-9).¹

¹ Gregory the Great (Hom. 37): Ipsos irrisores patimur quos ad malum persuasores habemus.

It is well worthy of remark, and indeed I have briefly remarked already (p. 177), how greatly our Lord loves to bring out some truth which He would very earnestly enforce and commend to men, by two successive images ; like, and yet unlike ; approaching it from different quarters ; the second oftentimes going deeper into the heart of the matter than did the first, at all events presenting it in some aspect under which the first did not, perhaps in the nature of things could not, present it ; the two in this manner mutually completing one another. It is thus for example with the parables of the mustard-seed and the leaven (Matt. xiii. 31-33); the former setting forth the outward development, the second the inward operation, of the truth; it is thus again with the Hid Treasure and the Pearl (Matt. xiii. 44-46), the first putting before us one who has found, the second one who has sought as well as found, the kingdom of heaven. So too, as we have seen, the new wine in the old vessels is something more, and contains a profounder lesson, than the new patch upon the old garment (Matt. ix. 16, 17). Another example we have here, where the king, measuring beforehand his own forces and the forces of the adversary whom he is tempted to challenge to the conflict, tells us something which the builder, sitting down to count the cost of the tower which he is planning to erect, would not have told. There is sometimes a further gain in a duplicate illustration such as this; and such gain is here. Any misgiving as to the correctness of the interpretation which has been here put upon the first similitude must, I am persuaded, disappear, with a careful study of the second.

¹ A characteristic passage in Jeremy Taylor's Sermons, Of Luke-warmness and Zeal, contains no direct reference to these words of our Lord, yet such can scarcely have not been intended : 'So have I seen a fair structure begun with art and care, and raised to half its stature ; and then it stood still by the misfortune or negligence of the owner, and the rain descended, and dwelt in its joints, and supplanted the contexture of its pillars ; and having stood awhile like the antiquated temple of a deceased oracle, it fell into a hasty age, and sunk upon its own knees, and so descended into ruin : so is the imperfect, unfinished spirit of a man ; it lays the foundation of a holy resolution, and strengthens it with vows and arts of prosecution, it raises up the walls, sacraments and prayers, reading and holy ordinances ; and holy actions begin with a slow motion, and the building stays, and the spirit is weary, and the soul is naked, and exposed to temptation, and in the days of storm take in every thing that can do it mischief ; and it is faint and sick, listless and tired, and it stands till its own weight wearies the foundation, and then declines to death and sad disorder, being so much the worse because it hath not only returned to its first follies, but hath super-added unthankfulness and carelessness, a positive neglect, and a despite of holy things, a setting a low price to the things of God, laziness and wretchedness : all which are evils superadded to the first state of coldness, whither he is with all these loads and circumstances of death easily revolved.'

That in the sphere of things natural the course which Christ here recommends is the only wise one, this is self-evident. Any other would be fraught with uttermost hazard, with almost inevitable ruin, to him who pursued it. War indeed is sweet, as the ancient proverb assures us, to those who have never tried it;¹ and examples out of number of kings who, committing themselves to an unequal struggle, have drawn down ruin on themselves and on their kingdom, history sacred and profane will alike supply. Croesus in profane history, Amaziah (2 Kin. xiv. 8-12) and Josiah (2 Kin. xxiii. 29, 30) in sacred, will suggest themselves at once. Hezekiah, on the contrary, wise betimes, and knowing how much over-matched he would prove in conflict with the great king of Assyria, sends an ambassage, while the other is yet at a distance, desiring conditions of peace : ' I have offended ; return from me ; that which thou putttest on me will I bear ' (2 Kin. xviii. 14).

¹ Γλυκὺς ἀπείρω πόλεμος.

But it is with the spiritual counterpart of this wisdom that we have here to do. The exposition which I have felt bound to reject, that, I mean, which makes the king who might come with his twenty thousand against him who with ten thousand should imprudently provoke a war, to be the devil, altogether paralyses ver. 32 ; for what can be the meaning of sending an ambassage to him, and desiring of him conditions of peace ? How can we conceive, as has been urged already, counsel such as this issuing from the lips of the Lord ? Lange, who clings to the common interpretation, can only evade the difficulty which it offers in this way : ' peace here according to the sense of the image can only mean a truce, and the request for peace only the avoiding of a premature conflict, to which the Christian as yet is unequal.' It is a still poorer escape to urge, as does Calvin, that all parts of such a parabolic saying as this must not be pressed, that some in the interpretation may be very well allowed to fall away. This in itself is most true ; yet what part could be pressed, if this, in which the whole teaching evidently culminates, might not be so ?¹ But how profound is the lesson here, when we recognize in this king who might come against us with his twenty thousand, with a might altogether overpowering ours, no other than God Himself. He is a true fighter against God, a θεομάχος quite as truly, though in another way, as the openly ungodly, who would fain be anything in his sight, who, face to face with God, would assert himself at all; who does not renounce all that he hath, and, as that which is the dearest to him, and cleaves closest to the natural man, his own righteousness the first of all.¹

¹ Gerhard (Herm. Evang. 120) in like manner owns that not merely we must not press this part of the similitude, but in the application go quite counter to it, which it is difficult to think was the Lord's intention : Tantum hoc observemus in hac militiâ, quo a propositâ parabolâ discedimus : ut quandoquidem hic hostis nunquam nobis honestas pacis conditiones proponit, nos etiam nunquam cum ipso paciscamur, nec ullam pacem vel otium ab ipso expectemus, quamdiu mortalem hanc vitam in his terris degimus.

The book of Job will supply the amplest and richest materials for the illustration of these words. The patriarch himself was sorely tempted to be such a fighter against God, with his ten thousand to challenge Him with his twenty thousand. Early indeed in the great and terrible struggle of his life he has glimpses more than one of the madness of provoking to the conflict of righteousness such an adversary; as, for instance, when he exclaims, 'How should man be just with God? If he will contend with Him, he cannot answer Him one of a thousand' (ix. 2, 3); and again, 'If I wash myself with snow-water, and make my hands never so clean, yet shalt

¹ Bengel: Hæc igitur rogatio pacis exprimit odium animæ propriæ [ver. 26], quo quis, omni suitate abnegatâ, meræ se gratiæ committit. Ædificator pecunias, belligerator copias, discipulus parentes et caritates omnes abnegat et impendit. Illi habent apparatus positivum, hic negativum. Maldonatus, who has almost always something valuable on the harder passages in Scriptures, sees clearly that the king coming with his twenty thousand cannot be Satan, with whom we never must have peace, nay rather a πόλεμος δσπονδος; but only doubtfully suggests that by him God Himself may be intended: Mittere vero legationem et rogare quæ pacis sunt non est a diabolo, hoste capitali nostro, pacem petere, quocum perpetuum nobis bellum gerendum est, nec pacem unquam licet pangere. Nam et in pace vincimur; hoc enim pejus et turpius; quod in bello quidem, ut milites decet, repugnantes atque resistentes, in pace volentes, sine vulnere, sine sanguine, superamur.

Thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me' (ix. 30, 31); but at other times he is very far from having renounced all that he has; thus see xxiii. 3-5, and indeed that chapter throughout. It is only at the last that he altogether does so, lays his hand upon his mouth, confesses that he has nothing with which to answer God (xl. 4), and abhors himself in dust and ashes (xlii. 5, 6); demands, that is, conditions of peace, and, having demanded, obtains them (xlii. 7-17). St. Paul would have been another such fighter against God, if those things which he once counted gain he had resolved to count gain to the end; if, refusing to submit himself to the righteousness of God, he had stood out upon a righteousness of his own (Phil. iii. 3-9). But he also on the way to Damascus learned better; and when, with his face to the ground, he asked, 'What wilt Thou have me to do?' he, too, was exactly falling in with that which Christ here declares to be the only wisdom for every man, demanding conditions of peace from that far mightier King, with whom it is impossible for flesh and blood, for sinful man, to contend.¹

¹ I know none in the ancient Church, and only Bengel and Stier among modern interpreters, who have grasped the meaning of this portion of Scripture with at all so firm a hand as Gregory the Great has done. I have already quoted words of his on the only way in which the necessary cost for the building of the tower is to be got together. He too has apprehended rightly what so few have apprehended, namely, that the king who might come against us with his twenty thousand, with whom therefore it is prudent to make terms betimes, is not Satan, but God; thus Hom. 37 in Evang.: Rex contra regem ex æquo venit ad prælium, et tamen si se perpendit non posse sufficere, legationem mittit, et ea quæ pacis sunt postulat. Quibus ergo non lacrymis veniam sperare debemus, qui in illo tremendo examine cum Rege nostro ex æquo ad iudicium non venimus? quos nimirum conditio, infirmitas, et causa inferiores exhibet . . . Quid ergo agendum est, fratres, nisi ut dum nos cum simplo exercitu contra duplum illius sufficere non posse conspicimus, dum adhuc longe est, legationem mittamus, et rogemus ea quæ pacis sunt? Longe enim esse dicitur, qui adhuc præsens

We may take an example from the opposite side. The Pharisee in the parable (Luke xviii. 9-14), when he enumerated the long catalogue of his virtues, was precisely one who was refusing to forsake all that he had, rather was hugging this all as closely as he could. He was calculating his means, and finding that he had enough to finish the tower; he was mustering his forces, and so disastrously overrating their strength, that he did not fear to set himself in battle-array against Him who resisteth the proud, and giveth grace only unto the humble. The publican, on the contrary, in the same parable, was avowing that for the carrying up of the tower he had not enough, he had nothing; that the war was one in which he could not so much as look his mightier Adversary in the face; and exclaiming, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' he threw down his arms, and sought, while there was yet time, conditions of peace.

Let me observe, before quitting this matter, that there is a certain fine irony in our Lord's falling in so far with man's dream of being something and being able to hold his own even in the face of God, as to speak of him as a king over against another king, king against king—in his so far falling in with man's dream of self-righteousness, and estimate of his own powers, as to speak of the ten thousand which he could bring against the twenty thousand of God, as though he were only over-matched in the proportion of two to one; while, indeed, a day will arrive, when he who in Christ's school has learned anything which he ought to learn, will be ready to cry, 'I cannot answer Thee one thing in a thousand.'

per judicium non videtur. Mittamus ad hunc legationem, lacrymas nostras, mittamus misericordiæ opera, cognoscamus nos cum eo in iudicio non posse consistere, pensemus virtutem ejus fortitudinis, rogemus ea quæ pacis sunt. Hæc est nostra legatio, quæ Regem venientem placat.

I ought not to leave unnoticed that some modern Roman Catholic expositors have sought to escape the difficulties which I have stated to cleave to the common interpretation of Christ's words here in this way. They plead that they are not addressed to the whole body of disciples or candidates for discipleship, but only to as many as might be meditating whether they should undertake or not the so-called 'counsels of perfection.' These are warned that they should accurately consider beforehand whether they have strength sufficient for the fulfilling of these; and, if they discover that they have not, should not so much as attempt them. All this, as may be seen in the words of one quoted below, is ingenious enough;¹ and undoubtedly some difficulties would so be evaded; but such an explanation contains no help for us, who believe that all Christians are invited to be perfect, as their Father in heaven is perfect (Matt. v. 48), and who further can trace no intimation that these words were addressed to a select few, an inner circle, but on the contrary a statement the most distinct that they were spoken to 'great multitudes' (ver. 25).

¹ Cajetan: Significatur regis nomine professurus statum perfectioris vitæ. Bellum adversus alium regem est perfectior vita ad superandum mundum, quantum ad licita communiter aliis, puta, habere agros, vacare humanis negotiis, et reliqua hujusmodi, hominibus quidem licita, apostolicæ autem perfectioni interdicta. Et describitur mundus duplicatâ potentiâ adversus profitentem vitam perfectiorem, quia et pugnat communi impugnatione, trahendo ad illicita communiter omnibus, et pugnat speciali impugnatione, trahendo ad interdicta apostolicæ vitæ. Si enim, consideratâ proprii animi dispositione, imparem se videt tanto prælio, sapienter prævenit, rogans ea quæ pacis sunt, non aggreditur statum perfectioris vitæ, contentus statu communi.

13. ZACCHÆUS.

Luke xix. 1-10.

THE Lord is on his way to Jerusalem, on that last journey thither, which was so rich in incidents, and whereof St. Luke has preserved for us so full and faithful a record. 'And Jesus entered and passed through Jericho. And behold there was a man named Zacchæus, which was the chief among the publicans.'¹ It was only natural that Jericho, from its position close to the fords of Jordan (Josh. ii. 1), and as the frontier city on entering the land from Peræa, set, too, as it was in the richest plain of Palestine, and that which abounded most in the choicest productions of that favoured land, in the rare and costly balsam above all,² should be the seat of an officer of a somewhat superior rank, who should there preside over the collection of the revenues of the state.

¹ His superior dignity probably suggests άνηρ, not άνθρωπος, twice used in regard of him (ver. 1, 7). Whether he was one of the publicani, the farmers of the revenue, or held some intermediate rank between these and the portitores, the actual collectors of the customs and taxes, is uncertain; but the latter is the more probable supposition. The fact that the publicani were generally Romans, and Roman knights, would not indeed of itself be decisive on the matter; for Josephus tells us that Jews sometimes attained to this dignity. Yet is it more probable that the άρχιτελώνης belonged himself to the τελώναι, although, as the name implies, having many subordinate officers under him.

² Pliny, Hist. Nat. xii. 54.

Such an officer was Zacchæus; one too who had not failed to win that wealth, for the sake of which he had been content to brave the contempt of his fellow-countrymen, and, as a traitor to the national cause, to come under their uttermost scorn. And yet, rich as he was, he had not, as the sequel shews, incurred the woe of those rich who are full, and who have so received their consolation here, that all longings for a higher consolation are extinct in them (Luke vi. 24). We may take, as an evidence of this, the fact that 'he sought to see Jesus,—who He was;' not 'who He was' in the sense of 'what manner of person;' but, 'which He was' of that confused multitude, to distinguish Him from his company.¹ And he sought this, as the issue proves, out of no mere curiosity, such as Herod's (Luke xxiii. 8); but much more nearly in the temper of those Greeks who at the feast desired to see Jesus (John xii. 21). He may not have known, or given any account to himself, out of what motives this anxiety to see the Lord had its rise; yet assuredly there were yearnings here, unconscious they may have been, of the sick man toward his Healer, of the sinner toward his Saviour.

Outward circumstances are unfavourable to the accomplishment of his wish. 'He could not' see Him 'for the press, because he was little of stature.'² So earnest, however, is he in the matter, that, rather than be defeated of his longing, he devises a way for the satisfying of it, which will involve, indeed, a certain compromise of his dignity, but from which he does not on this account shrink. Many, no doubt, will wonder that he, a rich man, and of some official position in the city, should climb up, like one of the populace, into a tree, the better to see a spectacle passing below. But there is that in him which will not allow such respects as these to have any weight at the present. He has not, or he overcomes, that false pride, out of which so many precious opportunities, and oftentimes in the highest things of all, are lost.¹ Jericho and the neighbourhood was famous for its palms ('the city of palm-trees,' Deut. xxxiv. 3; Judg. iii. 13). No stately palm-tree, however, but a tree of much humbler name, plays its part in this story. There are no sycamores now in the plain of Jericho, although found elsewhere in the Holy Land (Robinson); but a sycamore on this occasion bore fruit of the noblest kind; so that Fuller with good right exclaims, 'Who dares say sycamores are always barren? See one here loaden with good fruit.'² For into one of these Zacchæus climbs, hoping, it may be, for he has run before the multitude, effectually to conceal himself in its leafy screen, before the throng of the crowd come by; these will be the less likely to remark him, as their attention will be turned in quite another direction.

¹ Maldonatus: Quis esset eorum quos in confertâ et confusâ videbat turbâ.

² Augustine (Serm. 174): Noli te extollere; pusillus esto, Zacchæus esto. Sed dicturus es, Si Zacchæus fuero, præ turbâ non potero videre Jesum. Noli esse tristis; adscende lignum, ubi pro te pependit Jesus, et videbis Jesum; with much other profitable adaptation of the words.

¹ Calvin: Signum enim vehementis desiderii fuit, arborem conscendere, quum divites ut plurimum sint fastuosi, seque specie gravitatis venditent. Neque enim Christi conspectum sine cælesti instinctu tantopere expeteret. Sic Dominus sæpe priusquam se hominibus manifestet, cæcum illis affectum inspirat, quo feruntur ad ipsum adhuc latentem et incognitum.

² A Pisgah Sight of Palestine, ii. 12. From these words it is obvious that Fuller took for correct the old derivation of συκομυρία, finding μυρία foolish, and not μύρον the mulberry tree, in the latter half of the word: porro sicomorus figus fatua dicitur, eo quod inanes figus generat (Stella; and so Augustine, Serm. 174, § 3). This, it need hardly be said, is an error, the sycamore deriving its name from a resemblance to the fig in its fruit, to the mulberry in its leaves. Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. ix. § 90): Zacchæus in *sycomor*o, novum novi temporis pomum.

If this was at all his expectation, he is disappointed in it; for 'when Jesus came to the place He looked up;' and He, who knows how to find his own in the most unlikely places, who had seen Nathanael under the fig-tree, with sure and unerring glance discerned Zacchæus in the sycamore, and at once laid bare his hiding-place; addressing him by his name, for 'He calleth his own sheep by name' (John x. 3); and drawing him forth from his concealment with that word, 'Zacchæus, make haste and come down.' This dealing of the Lord with Zacchæus is not unlike his compelling of the woman with an issue of blood to come out of the crowd, and to confess before all that she had touched Him, and why (Luke viii. 47). . Like that, it is meant for the overcoming of a false shame; and the words are not without a certain delicate rebuke that he should have chosen that method of seeing the Lord, instead of coming boldly forward, and joining himself to his disciples. Yet that faint rebuke was made good at once by the very gracious words that follow: 'for to-day I must abide at thy house;'¹ words of an extraordinary grace, for while the Lord accepted many invitations into the houses of men (Luke vii. 36; xiv.), yet we do not read that He honoured any but this one by thus offering Himself to his hospitality. 'Adopting the royal style,' as the author of Ecce Homo puts it well, 'which was familiar to Him, and which commends the loyalty of a vassal in the most delicate manner, by freely exacting his services, He informed Zacchæus of his intention to visit him, and signified his pleasure that a banquet should be instantly prepared.'

¹ Augustine (Serm. 113): Volebas videre transeuntem; hodie hic apud te invenies habitantem.

The word of gracious command was not spoken in vain. Zacchæus was as ripe fruit, which dropped into the Saviour's lap at his first and lightest touch: 'He made haste and came down, and received Him joyfully.' Each had found what he was looking for, the Saviour and the sinner; the Shepherd had found his sheep, and the sheep its Shepherd. Some, as usual, were displeased—as many as conceived of the Christ as a prince of Pharisees, rather than a Saviour of sinners. These, 'when they saw it, all murmured, saying, That He was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner.'¹ Could He not have chosen some other for his host? Jericho was a city of priests, as well as a city of publicans. The Talmudists tell us that there were almost as many priests there as at Jerusalem itself; so that it is a stroke from the life to introduce in the parable of the Good Samaritan the priest and the Levite, as passing exactly along that road which led from one of these cities where they dwelt to the other where their duties lay (Luke x. 31, 32). With such a choice of hosts from whom to select, would it not have better become a preacher of righteousness to select some other than this sinner, whose house to honour with his presence? Surely it was ill done by a favour so signal to reverse that just sentence of social excommunication under which the publicans, and Zacchæus among the number, lay (Luke xv. 2).

Probably the murmurers, with these words of discontent on their lips, with these thoughts of displeasure in their hearts, followed to the house of Zacchæus. But they meet there with a practical refutation of their discontent; there it is plainly shewn that the Lord had chosen well, when He chose this man for his host and entertainer. He was one who was as smoking flax, which they would have quenched outright, but which the Lord with only a breath of his mouth fanned into a light flame. Christ's presence in his house forms a parallel by way of contrast to his presence in the house of the Pharisee (Luke vii. 36; cf. xiv. 1). There he could bring no blessing, for there was there no sense of need; there the Pharisee esteemed that he was honouring the Lord, not that he was being honoured by Him.

¹ Augustine (Serm. 184): Hoc erat, reprehendere quod in domum ægroti intravit medicus.

Some place what follows on the next day, assuming the Lord to have tarried a night under the roof of Zacchæus, and that on the following morning, perhaps as his divine guest was about to depart, Zacchæus stood forth and made this profession of a new life, with a making good, so far as this might be, of the faults of his old. Yet I cannot but esteem the 'to-day' of ver. 5 to be too clearly taken up by 'this day' of ver. 9, to allow of such a supposition.¹ Rather the meal was ended at which he had been permitted to entertain his Lord; and he then stood forth, making that practical answer to these murmurers, which ought to have silenced, and perhaps did silence some of them; for it shewed that he had not received the grace of God in vain; it shewed what the condescending love of the Saviour could effect, how it could separate a man for ever from his old conversation, to walk henceforward in newness of life. In the presence then of them all (see ver. 11), 'Zacchæus,' who had so long, like another Levi, sat at the receipt of custom, 'stood,' or stood forth, 'and said unto the Lord; Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation,¹ I restore him fourfold.' The present, 'I give,' expresses the fixedness of his resolve. Although this distribution of his goods is still future, yet that future to him is as if actually present. To make it stand for a past, and to accept this 'I give,' and 'I restore,' as an expression of his past conduct in the stewardship of this worldly mammon, as though Zacchæus had been another Cornelius, 'a devout man, which gave much alms to the people' (Acts x. 2), is a curious missing and marring of the whole point of this incident, in fact a most notable piece of Pharisaic exegesis.² Zacchæus might, and would even then, have needed the higher righteousness of Christ, but he would scarcely have been until this day one of the 'lost.' Salvation would not on that day have first come to his house. But it is not thus. All this which he now announces of a giving of his own, and a restoring of that which is another's, is rather to be taken as the first-fruits of Christ's visit, the outward utterance of the mighty inward change that had passed upon him. Now is he a righteous man according to that rule of the prophet (Ezek. xviii. 21, 22 ; xxxiii. 15), and his name and he are agreed.¹

¹ Nothing can be built on καταλίσαι, as though, which some urge, this must imply the tarrying for a night. We have in Xenophon (Anab. i. 10. 19), καταλίσαι τὸ στράτευμα πρὸς ἄριστον.

¹ The verb συκοφαντεῖν occurs in the New Testament only here and at Luke iii. 14. It is rendered there, 'to accuse falsely;' here 'to take anything by false accusation;' and in the Geneva, 'to take by forged cavillation.' The use of the word as to defraud or to wring out by chicane is not uncommon in the Greek orators. Rettig (Theoll. Stud. und Krit. 1838, p. 775) observes that, while the story of the forbidden export of figs from Attica, and of the συκοφάντης as one who denounced this, is, as all now admit, a later invention to explain the word, still it is so manifestly connected with σῖκον and φαίνειν, that in them the key to unlock its meaning must be looked for. He suggests that the συκοφάντης was originally one who informed against him who made to the State too small returns of his property for the purposes of taxation; and the figtree being a chief source of wealth in Attica, informed against him who returned the number of these, or the crop derived from them, below the mark. He observes that συνέβιος, an informer, and συνάγειν=συκοφαντεῖν, both point in the same direction.

² Maldonatus: Aliqui interpretantur quasi antequam ad ipsum Christus venisset, solitus fuisset dimidiam bonorum suorum partem pauperibus dare, et si quid quem defraudasset, quadruplum reddere. Cyprian (De Op. et Eleem.) is one of these; but many more adhere to the true interpretation, as Irenæus (Con. Hær. iv. 12), who sees in this to which Zacchæus adjudges himself, solutionem præteritæ cupiditatis; and Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. iv. 37.

Yet while the words, 'If I have taken anything from any man,' must not be regarded as expressing only a possible case, which the speaker regards as very improbable an actual, neither must they be pressed too far in the other direction. It is not, indeed, such a confident clearing of himself as Samuel's (1 Sam. xii. 3); yet neither, on the other hand, is it to be accepted as the confession and admission of an habitual unrighteousness, a free allowing of himself hitherto in chicane and wrong. Zacchæus had been hitherto no extortioner. Had he been so, had he been conscious that his were in the main treasures of wickedness, gotten together by fraud and wrong, it would have been ridiculous to offer as a gift half of them to the poor, before it was seen whether the whole would satisfy the demands of justice, might not be swallowed up in acts of restitution, with such addition as the law required. Without, however, having been this extortioner, he yet feels that, according to that higher standard of right which he recognizes now, some of his gains may prove to have been unfairly acquired ; for, as the Italian proverb has it, there is seldom a great stream into which some turbid water has not entered. Any such injustice he will make largely good, even to a fourfold restitution, calmly adjudging against himself that which David in his extreme indignation adjudged against him that had taken his neighbour's lamb (2 Sam. xii. 6), imposing a maximum of penalty on himself ; much more than the law save in some exceptional cases required (Exod. xxi. 9).

¹ יָשָׁר = justus. Without restitution, as Augustine (Ep. liv. ad Maced.) says well, pœnitentia non agitur, sed fingitur.

The words that follow are spoken to Zacchæus, but in the hearing of the multitude, and for them no less than for him. This appears in the third person, under which he is addressed. As meant for him, they are an acceptance, on the Lord's part, of this offering of his goods as the true expression of a higher offering, even of a dedication of himself to God : 'This day is salvation come to this house.'¹ As addressed to the multitude, they contain a further justification of the grace shewn to this man that was a sinner. Sinner as he is, salvation has yet come to his house, 'forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham' (cf. xiii. 16); one therefore to whom this mercy was due ; for their view, as may here be fitly observed, is worthy of no acceptance who assume Zacchæus to have been a heathen, and the Lord therefore to style him 'a son of Abraham' only in an ethical sense, a follower, that is, of the faith of Abraham (Matt. iii. 9 ; Rom. iv. 12). It is well known that some, both in ancient and modern times, have so understood it, or at least have suggested this as possible,¹ but in the face of all evidence alike external and internal. Zacchæus (Zaccai) is a Jewish name, occurring Ezra ii. 9; Nehem. vii. 14; 2 Macc. x. 19, and in the Talmud. Had he been not merely 'a sinner,' but 'a sinner of the Gentiles,' the murmuring multitudes would assuredly have urged as the head and front of Christ's offending, not 'that He was gone to be a guest with a sinner,' but with 'a Gentile'—which, indeed, would have been in their sight so enormous an aggravation of the offence, that it would have been impossible they should pass it over without notice. Neither did it belong to the fitness of the Lord's earthly life, 'a minister' as He was 'of the circumcision, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers' (Rom. xv. 8), that He should violate the ordinances and customs of the Jews, which, so acting, He would have done (Acts x. 28; xi. 2, 3; Gal. ii. 12). As little can any argument be founded on that word 'lost,' as applied to Zacchæus; for elsewhere the Lord speaks of 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel;' and if, as surely is the case, the gulf between what a man is, and what he was intended to be, is the truly tragic thing in his destinies, is that which alone furnishes the proper measure of his loss and of his fall, who, then, so 'lost' as a son of Abraham, that, not being a heathen, was yet sunk down to a level with the heathen? Such was Zacchæus; and such 'lost' as he was the Son of man declares that He was come 'to seek and to save.'

¹ On the words 'to this house,' rather than 'to this man,' Grotius delicately remarks, ut ostendat relatam hospitii gratiam. Yet hardly so ; the parallel is to be rather found in such passages as Acts xvi. 33, 34. It is doubtless for the sake of this verse that this Scripture supplies in the Roman Catholic Church the Gospel for the service on the occasion of the dedication of churches.

This said, He seems to have moved forward without further delay on his journey toward Jerusalem, leaving that 'house' poorer in this world's riches, certainly by one half, and probably by more than one half, than if He had never entered into it; and yet, as He Himself declares, how immeasurably richer too; for One bringing salvation had lodged within it; and, though He was now quitting it for ever, the salvation which He had brought with Him remained behind.

¹ Thus Tertullian (Adv. Marc. iv. 37: Zacchæus, allophylus fortasse), Cyprian, Chrysostom, Maldonatus, Stella, and others. Some, on the other hand, have identified him with Matthias, the future apostle; Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 6) for example.

14. THE TRUE VINE.

John xv. 1-6.

MANY interpreters have thought it necessary to look in the external world for some object which will have suggested this similitude to the mind of the Lord. Some, for example, who suppose that his 'Arise, let us go hence,' with which the preceding chapter concluded, was not acted on at once, but that He lingered still, have imagined to themselves a spreading vine, whose branches found their way into the chamber in which He and his disciples had just celebrated their last supper together (Ps. cxxviii. 3). But surely those words of his, 'Arise, let us go hence,' leave no room for this supposition. On the part of the disciples there could have been no tarrying, after they had received such a summons; and when the Lord used these words, He must have intended what He said. When others suggest that passing, as He may very well have done, through a vineyard on his way to the brook Kedron, He found his motive there, one can only reply that this and every other suggestion of like kind appear merely and altogether superfluous; that it becomes us far better to believe that, as all worlds, natural and spiritual, lay ever open before Him, and the innermost essences of things, so he drew freely from this inexhaustible storehouse whatever was most adapted to his present need. There was quite enough to suggest this image of closest union between Him and his people in that sacrament of union, which had just been instituted by Him, and in which He had declared of the fruit of the vine, of the 'pure blood of the grape' (Gen. xlix. 11 ; Deut. xxxii. 14), blessed and consecrated by Him, 'This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins.' We may dismiss then, as unnecessary, all speculations on the external motive which He found for this discourse.

T

At the same time when our Lord affirms of Himself, 'I am the true vine,' with what, it may be very fitly asked, does He liken Himself, over what claim a superiority; for in that 'true' He manifestly claims actually to be what some other persons or things falsely pretended to be, or else to be fully and perfectly what they only partially, inadequately, and most imperfectly were? The word which He employs is decisive that it is the latter which He intends;¹ to keep which in mind will help us much to understand what follows. And first, He certainly does not liken Himself, which is Lampe's suggestion, to that golden vine of exquisite workmanship, a symbol no doubt of the theocracy, which was one of the chief ornaments of Herod's temple, nor avouch Himself as 'the true vine,' by comparison with it. And if not to that dead work of man's art and device, as little does He name Himself 'the true vine,' as contradistinguished from the natural plant. Not a few have understood Him thus. Tholuck, for example, has done so : 'The Saviour would intimate here that the relation which finds place between the vine and its branches is one which reveals itself in its highest potency in the spiritual relation between the Saviour and them that believe on Him ; the kingdom of nature being a prophecy of the kingdom of grace, so that in this last are found continually the fulfilments of the prophecies of the kingdom of nature.'¹ This last, being most true, and earth the shadow of heaven, and the things on earth the copies of things in the heavens, is yet not the truth of this passage. An antagonism far deeper, and moving far more distinctly in the region of moral and spiritual things, the Lord would indicate here. The key to the right understanding of this statement lies, as was long ago noted by Grotius,² in some words of Jeremiah, 'Yet I had planted thee a noble vine ; wholly a right seed ; how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto Me ?' (ii. 21)³ and Christ, claiming to be 'the true vine' claims perfectly to realize in Himself that divine idea which Israel after the flesh had altogether failed to fulfil. Set as this 'right seed,' it had become 'an empty vine,' which brought forth fruit to itself (Hos. x. 1), and none to God ; and should end in becoming that 'vine of the earth,' the clusters of whose grapes should be cast into the winepress of the wrath of God (Rev. xiv. 18-20). In confirmation of this view it is hardly necessary to observe that not in these passages only, but continually in the Old Testament the Jewish Church is set forth as a vine or vineyard (Ps. lxxx. 8-16; Isai. v. 1; Cant. viii. 11; Ezek. xix. 10-14), is rebuked for not being a true vine, for bearing grapes of Gomorrah, bitter fruit or none (Isai. v. 4; Deut. xxxii. 32; cf. 2 Kin. iv. 39), our Lord taking up the same language in the New (Luke xiii. 6; Matt. xxi. 33). But what Israel should have been, and was not, this Christ, the true Israel, was.

¹ For the distinction between ἀληθής and ἀληθινός see my Synonyms of the New Testament, § 8. 'Αληθής (=verax) is the true as set over against the false (Rom. iii. 4); ἀληθινός (=verus) is the true as set over against the imperfect, the inadequate, that which has at best but types, shadows, and outlines of the truth; as Origen puts it well, πρὸς ἀντιδιαστολὴν σκιᾶς καὶ τύπου καὶ εἰκότος (cf. John i. 9; vi. 32; Heb. viii. 2).

¹ So Maldonatus: Quia melius et perfectius homines in se per fidem natos nutrit, quam sarmenta sua naturalis vitis.

² Ergo cum se illam veram vitem vocat, intelligit sibi denuin excellenter competere ista epitheta, Jer. ii. 21. Genuina, non fera vitis.

³ Ἐγὼ δὲ ἐφύτευσά σε ἀμπελον καρποφόρον, πᾶσαν ἀληθινήν· πῶς ἐστράφης εἰς πικρίαν, ἡ ἀμπελος ἡ ἀλλοτρία ; (LXX.)

'And my Father is the husbandman.'¹ This passage was a very favorite one with the Arians; as many slight allusions or longer discussions on the part of those who took share in the Church's great conflict with these gain-sayers, abundantly attest. The reason is obvious. The doctrinal statement of this verse, not qualified by other statements, was capable of being made to imply an entire subordination on the part of the Son to the Father, the relations in fact of a creature to a Creator. Augustine and other theologians before him are careful to reply that it is in his humanity that Christ is 'the true vine.' It was of the very essence of his mediatorial work, of the days-man who should lay his hands upon both, that as on the one side He could say, 'I and my Father are one,' so upon the other, 'I and my brethren are one;' and He is here asserting the latter relation, not excluding the former.¹ But while the vine and the vine-branches must thus both be partakers of the same nature, for He that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified must both be of one (Heb. ii. 11), He will presently challenge for Himself, as Augustine does not fail to notice,² a share in the work of the husbandman, an office, which, only as He is one with the husbandman of this allegory, He could have any right to challenge for his own. He too has power to purge or cleanse through his word (ver. 3). Neither, when we affirm that in his humanity He was 'the true vine,' may we leave out of sight for a moment, that it was a divine humanity in which he was this, in a humanity united to his divinity, ennobled, deified, through this union; for only so could it have become a life-giving humanity to the world.³

¹ The word which our Lord uses here is γεωργός, not ἀμπελοργός. It is true that ἀμπελοργός would more directly designate the actual cultivator of the vine, whose own hands dress and prune it; yet at the same time his office is altogether a subordinate one (see Luke xiii. 7); while γεωργός, by Philo distinguished from γεωπónος or the actual labourer, in no way marks out a humble social status, as is sufficiently shown by such a passage as 2 Chron. xxvi. 10, where of King Uzziah it is said that he was a 'husbandman' (γεωργός ἦν). Noah in like manner is called ἀνθρῶπος γεωργός γῆς (Gen. ix. 20). So too by the γεωργοί of Matt. xxi. 33-41 are intended the chiefs and leaders of the Jewish theocracy. Not that the γεωργός need in the least be assumed to 'purge' or prune only by the hand of others. The labour of the vineyard is exactly of that lighter kind, in which the proprietor might be well pleased himself to take a share.

Affirming his Father to be 'the husbandman,' He excludes none from his Father's husbandry—not even, as

¹ Ambrose (De Fide, iv. 12): Illud quoque ad separandam Patris et Filii divinitatem objicere consueverunt, quia Dominus dixit in Evangelio, Ego sum vitis vera, et Pater meus agricola est; agricolam et vitem diversæ esse naturæ dicentes, et vitem in agricolæ esse potestate. Ambrose answers rightly: Dominus vitem se esse dixit, incarnationis suæ significans sacramentum. Basil the Great (Con. Eunom. iv. 3) puts the argument of the Arians: εἰ ἀμπελος, φασίν, ὁ Σωτὴρ, κλήματα δὲ ἡμεῖς, γεωργὸς δὲ ὁ Πατὴρ· τὰ δὲ κλήματα ὁμοφυῇ μὲν τῇ ἀμπέλῳ, ἣ δὲ ἀμπελος οὐχ ὁμοφυῆς τῷ γεωργῷ, ὁμοφυῆς μὲν ἡμῖν ὁ Υἱὸς, καὶ μέρος ἡμεῖς αὐτοῦ, οὐχ ὁμοφυῆς δὲ ὁ Υἱὸς τῷ Πατρὶ, ἀλλὰ κατὰ πάντα ἄλλότριος. Basil replies as Ambrose.

² Augustine: Denique cum de Patre tanquam de agricolâ dixisset, quod infructuosos palmites tollat, fructuosos autem purget, ut plus afferant fructum; continuo etiam seipsum mundatorem palmitum ostendens, Jam vos, inquit, mundi estis propter sermonem quem locutus sum vobis. Ecce et ipse mundator est palmitum, quod est agricolæ, non vitis, officium.

³ Augustine: Quamvis autem Christus vitis non esset, nisi homo esset, tamen istam gratiam palmitibus non præberet, nisi etiam Deus esset.

Chrysostom will have it, Himself, the vine, any more than his disciples, the vine-branches. He too learned obedience by the things which He suffered. All the trial and temptation of his walk upon earth, all 'the contradiction of sinners' which was allowed to come upon Him, all in which it pleased the Father to bruise Him and put Him to grief (Isai. liii. 10), all the awaking of the sword against Him, Jehovah's fellow (Zech. xiii. 7), this was throughout the discipline of his Father's love; to which He was submitted the first, that He might so become a pattern to all those who came after. 'Wonder not,' He would implicitly say to his disciples, 'at the sufferings which are coming upon Me; they are part of my Father's husbandry; still less wonder at your own; for "if these things be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?"'—all being 'dry trees' when brought into comparison with Him. That suffering which to flesh and blood is always so unwelcome He sets here in how comforting a light. It is a mark of the watchful care with which the heavenly husbandman is tending the vine, and the branches of the vine.

'Every branch in Me that beareth not fruit He taketh away.' There are then branches in Him, which are unfruitful, and which therefore are removed. Christ here anticipates the future condition of his Church; He contemplates a Church in which men shall find themselves in Him; as all infants baptized into Christ are in Him; planted together in the likeness of his death; but for whom it remains themselves to determine whether by believing and obeying, they shall make the potential blessings of this position actually their own; whether that fellowship with Christ, which has been so freely given to them, shall unfold itself into the new creation, into the whole Christian life; whether faith shall keep open the channels through which the power and grace and strength of Christ may flow into the soul, or unbelief shall stop them. The branches which shall have thus doomed themselves to unfruitfulness 'He taketh away.' In the natural world branches of the vine, which are not good for that to which they were specially ordained, namely for the bearing of fruit, are good for nothing. There are trees which may be turned to secondary uses, if they fail to fulfil their primary. Not so the vine. As timber it is utterly valueless (Ezek. xv. 3, 4). It is with it exactly as with the saltless salt, which, having lost its savour, is fit only to be cast out of doors; both of them being meet emblems of the spiritual man who is not spiritual, who is good neither for the work of this world nor of a higher. But on this 'He taketh away' what further might be fitly said may be better reserved for ver. 6, where the doom of the barren branches is more in detail set forth.

'And every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth¹ it, that it may bring forth more fruit.'² They assuredly are right who recognize in this 'He purgeth' no direct, but only a secondary, allusion to temptations and afflictions, as the means by which this purging is effected. It is the whole process of sanctification, the circumcision of the Spirit, by whatever discipline brought about, of which Christ is speaking, and to which He pledges his Father here. At the same time, seeing that afflictions play so large, so necessary a part in this process of sanctification, it is in a secondary sense most true that there is here a reference to these. Regarded as a means of this purifying, as an evidence of the intention of the heavenly husbandman that the fruit-bearing branches shall be more fruitful still, these may be welcomed, may be contemplated in some sort as rewards of obedience. St. James bids the faithful to welcome them, for the blessing they bring with them (i. 2-4, 12), and compare Heb. xii. 11; Rom. v. 3-5. To how many dealings of God with his own, mysterious, inscrutable, inexplicable otherwise, will this, kept properly in mind, furnish us with a key. Oftentimes the fine gold of some saint appears to us as if cleansed from all its dross; but the inexorable refiner, who sees with other eyes than ours, and detects remains of dross where we see only gold, flings it again into the furnace, that so it may be purer yet. Augustine has a striking image in illustration. Many a time, he observes, a portrait seems perfect in the judgment of all eyes save those of the artist who drew it. Others would fain see him now to hold his hand; they count that he cannot improve it, perhaps may mar it; but he returns it to the easel, touches and retouches still. And why? Because, being this artist, there floats before his mind's eye an ideal perfection, to which hitherto his work has not attained; but to which he would fain see it approach more nearly yet.

¹ Alpei, kabalpei: suavis rhythmus, as Bengel observes; but it is nothing more, for the words are not related to one another.

² Pliny (Hist. Nat. xiv. 14): [Numa] ex imputatâ vite libari vina diis, nefas statuit; ratione excogitatâ ut putare cogereantur, alias aratores, et pigri circa pericula arbusti; cf. c. xxii. From whosoever this remarkable prohibition came, it had, we may be quite sure, a much deeper meaning than that merely economical which the Roman naturalist (naturalist in both senses of this word), ascribes to it here; has its points of contact with Heb. xii. 5-11, its dim reachings-out after a symbolic setting forth of the truth which there is declared.

'Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you'—'clean' and yet needing to be 'cleansed.'¹ We have a hint here of the mystery of that double relation in which every believing man stands to God, of that double relation which is more fully and dogmatically stated in some of the Pauline Epistles; but which is yet distinctly anticipated here, and at John xiii. 10. The faithful in Christ Jesus are 'clean,' being by faith justified from all things, and having thus a standing-ground before God; which yet is in some sort an ideal one,—their actual state, although ever approximating to this, yet still failing to correspond to it,—they therefore needing by the same faith to appropriate ever more and more of that sanctifying grace, those purifying influences, which continually stream forth from Him on all them that are his; and by aid of which He is bringing them to be all that, which for his sake his Father has been already willing to regard them.²

¹ καθαροί, and yet of those whom the husbandman καθαίρει (ver. 2). Here there is a real connexion between the words, which we would gladly have seen reproduced in our Version. Augustine: Mundi atque mundandi. Neque enim, nisi mundi essent, fructum ferre potuissent; et tamen omnem, qui fert fructum, purgat agricola, ut fructum plus afferat. Fert fructum, quia mundus est; atque ut plus afferat, purgatur adhuc. Quis enim in hac vita sic mundus, ut non sit magis magisque mundandus?

² Gerhard (Harm. Evang. 177): *Quia dixerat Patrem purgare palmites fructuosos Christo insitos, ideo docet duplicem esse purgationem, videlicet purgationem primam, quæ est ipsa justificatio in remissione peccatorum consistens, atque insitionem in Christum, veram illam vitem, indivulso nexu conjunctam habens; et purgationem secundam, quæ consistit in quotidiana renovatione ac veteris Adami mortificatione, quæ non semel tantum fit, sicut regeneratio et in vitem insitio, sed singulis diebus repetitur, et per totam vitam continuatur. . . . Quia mundatio fit per verbum, ergo non immediate, sed per ministros Ecclesiæ verbum prædicantes et sacramenta administrantes, qui in hoc mundationis opere sunt Dei συνεργοί (1 Cor. iii. 9). . . . Christus non dicit, Mundi estis propter sermonem, quem inspiravi vobis, sed, quem locutus sum vobis. Ergo verbo prædicato et audito vim mundandi tribuit, quam ipso actu exserit, si fide recipitur.*

'Abide in Me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in Me.' Our Lord in his first words here does not say, as He is so often taken to say, 'If you abide in Me, I will also abide in you.' The second clause in this sentence is not promise, any more than the first; they are precept both: 'Take heed that ye abide in Me, and that I abide in you.'¹ The next verse, where the same words recur, and still more ver. 7, are decisive on this matter; see also vi. 56. It is of course only in a very restricted sense that the relations between Him and them are mutual. There is no correlation of forces. He is throughout and only a giver, they are throughout and only receivers.² The mystical use of this word 'to abide,' representing as it does the innermost fellowship and communion of the faithful with their Lord, and of their Lord with them, and occasionally representing a higher mystery still (John xiv. 10; xv. 10), is peculiar to St. John, but is very frequent both in his Gospel and in his Epistles, in the language of his Lord, and in his own which he has learned from that Lord.³

¹ We must not therefore complete κηρὸς ἐν ὑμῖν with μενῶ, but with μείνω. Bengel gives it well: Facite ut maneatis in me, et ut ego maneam in vobis. Godet's words are worth quoting here (Comm. sur l'Évang. de St. Jean): En moi exprime l'état dans lequel le chrétien fait abstraction de tout ce qui est sa sagesse, sa force, son mérite propre, pour puiser tout en Christ, sous ces différents rapports, par l'intime aspiration de la foi. Et c'est là l'unique condition de l'activité de Christ en nous. Jésus le fait sentir en supprimant à dessein le verbe dans la proposition suivante. Et moi en vous. Par cette ellipse il enveloppe le second de ces deux faits dans le premier de telle sorte que là où le premier s'accomplit, le second ne peut manquer d'arriver. De cette manière l'action de Christ est mise hardiment sous l'empire de notre liberté, aussi bien que la nôtre propre.

² Augustine: Ita in vite palmites sunt, ut viti non conferant, sed inde accipiant, unde vivunt; ita vero vitis est in palmitibus, ut vitale alimentum subministret eis, non sumat ab eis.

³ Besides the μείνω ἐν ὑμῖν here, or ἐν αὐτῷ (1 Ep. ii. 6) we have also

'I am the vine, ye are the branches.' Our Lord willingly repeats great truths which He would deeply imprint on the minds of his disciples; thus see John iii. 3, 5; vi. 48, 51; but in those places, as in this, with a variation, with a greater fulness on the second occasion than on the first, or with some other modification, which sufficiently justifies the repetition. In the present instance He now for the first time explicitly calls the disciples 'the branches,' however there may have been as much involved in words which He had uttered already. So, too, while He had already declared the abiding in Him to be the one condition of all fruit-bearing, He adds a promise now, that he who abides in Him shall not only bear fruit, but shall bear it abundantly: 'He that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without Me ye can do nothing.'

It is a poor and inadequate interpretation of these last words to make them to mean, 'Ye can do nothing until ye are in Me, and have my grace.' It is rather, 'After ye are in Me, ye can even then accomplish nothing except as ye draw life and strength from Me; only through a putting forth of my power which is in you can ye commence, carry forward, or bring any work to a good effect. From first to last it is I that must work in and through you.' We have a warning here to the regenerate man that he never seek to do aught of himself; not a declaration that the unregenerate is unable to do aught. Christ does not mean, 'Out of and apart from Me ye are powerμένειν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ (xv. 9); ἐν τῷ λόγῳ (viii. 31); ἐν τῷ φωτί (1 Ep. ii. 10); ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ (2 Ep. ix.); ἐν τῷ Πατρὶ (1 Ep. ii. 24); ἐν τῷ Θεῷ (1 Ep. iv. 16), all expressing, though from slightly different points of view, the same blessed and transcendent truth; and then, as the fearful contrast to all these, there is the μένειν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ (xii. 46); ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ (1 Ep. iii. 14).

less for good ;' but, ' Being in Me, only through putting forth of my power, suffering Me effectually to work in and through you, can you accomplish anything'—a truth which needs to be evermore repeated, for it is evermore in danger of being forgotten by us. The words are frequently appealed to by Augustine and others engaged in controversy with the Pelagians of old ;¹ even as in the formularies and symbolic books of the Reformed Churches they constantly appear as a dictum probans against all open or covert Pelagianism.

' If a man abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered' (cf. Ezek. xvii. 24 ; Matt. xxi. 19 ; Mark xi. 20, 21 ; Luke xxiii. 31). Some will fain have it that in giving these words their spiritual significance we must reverse their order, urging that the branch, because withered, is therefore cast forth, and not, because cast forth, therefore withered. But it is not so, either in the natural world or the spiritual ; and there is no sufficient reason for deserting the actual sequence of Christ's words, which only the strongest necessity should compel us to abandon. But, so far from such necessity existing, the declaration, as it now stands, yields a lesson the most solemn, one which, changing the order of the words, we should in good part miss. An unfruitful branch is not 'withered,' when broken off from its parent stock and stem ; on the contrary, it retains a deceitful greenness and freshness for a little while ; deceitful, because upon all this the sentence of death has irrevocably passed. Churches, which, through abandonment of the Catholic faith, individuals who, by unbelief and by the sins which spring from unbelief, have separated themselves off, and in the awful but secret judgments of God have been separated off, from Christ their Head, may keep for a while the show and semblance of life, may deceive others, may deceive even themselves—so long, that is, as any residue of that good thing which they have gotten from Christ remains. But little by little, sooner or later, they come to an end of all which they took with them. It fails and dies out, and, once wasted and gone, there is nothing to replace it ; and thus death, moral and spiritual, steals over all ; they are ‘withered,’ this withering of theirs being not seldom evident to the eyes of all.

¹ Thus Augustine (Con. duas Ep. Pelag. ii. 8) : Dominus autem ut responderet futuro Pelagio, non ait, Sine me difficile potestis aliquid facere, sed ait, Sine me nihil potestis facere. Et ut responderet futuris etiam istis in eadem ipsâ Evangelicâ sententiâ, non ait, Sine me nihil potestis perficere, sed, facere. Nam si perficere dixisset, possent isti respondere, non ad incipiendum bonum, quod a nobis est, sed ad perficiendum, esse Dei adiutorium necessarium. Dominus cum ait, Sine me nihil potestis facere, hoc uno verbo initium finemque comprehendit.

‘And men gather them ;’ or, better, ‘and they gather them,’ bring them together into one bundle of death,¹ leaving who the gatherers are in the awful obscurity which rests upon it in the original. Some words of Isaiah, ‘When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off ; the women come, and set them on fire’ (xxvii. 11), constitute an interesting parallel. The gatherers are the angels, the ministers of the divine anger, to whom the final execution of the divine judgments is everywhere committed (Matt. xiii. 41, 49 ; xxiv. 31 ; Luke xix. 24 ; Rev. xix. 24). ‘And cast them into the fire, and they are burned ;’ or, in its simplicity more terrible still, and they burn’ cf. Ezek. xv. 4). But all which is here expressed or implied, of ‘the fire’ (Matt. iii. 10), ‘the flame’ (Luke xvi. 24), 'the flaming fire' (2 Thess. i. 8), 'the furnace of fire' (Matt. xiii. 42, 50), 'the gehenna of fire' (Matt. v. 22; Mark ix. 43), 'the lake of fire' (Rev. xx. 15; xxi. 8), 'the everlasting fire' (Matt. xxv. 41; Jude 7), with all the secrets of anguish which words like these, if there be any truth in words, must involve, demands rather to be trembled at than needs to be expounded.

¹ Συμβάουσι : cf. συλλέγουσι, Matt. xiii. 41 ; and Isai. xxiv. 2.

We pause here. It is true that echoes and reminiscences of this allegory still recur through the chapter, very distinctly in the next three or four verses, where exhortations are clothed in imagery which it offers, promises linked with a fulfilling by disciples, of all which the fact of being branches in Him implies, means by which these shall abide in his love declared; but these reminiscences are ever growing weaker and weaker; the vine and the vine-branches more and more fade out of sight; so that after this verse there is nothing which of necessity links itself on to this allegory, or which would not be perfectly intelligible without any reference to it, and supposing that Christ had never uttered it. Here, therefore, is the fittest place to pause.

15. THE PENITENT MALEFACTOR.

Luke xxiii. 39-43.

WE might beforehand have anticipated that, were the history of the penitent malefactor recorded in one Gospel only, it would be in the Gospel of St. Luke; which is above all the Gospel of pardon and grace, and among the Gospels the correlative of the Pauline Epistles among the Epistles. St. Luke, the companion of St. Paul, lays, more than any other Evangelist, the groundwork upon which the latter builds; teaching historically that which St. Paul teaches dogmatically, namely, that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound (vii. 47; xv.; xix. 10). We have in the history before us an example, and a very notable one, of that wondrous law of selection, according to which, out of the inexhaustible treasure-house of our Lord's sayings and doings upon earth, each Evangelist severally appropriates that which agrees best with his special purpose and aim. Such a law we may continually recognize, so soon as the eye is once opened to look for and expect it.

We read in the verses which immediately precede this wondrous story, of the wild flood of blasphemy and scorn which foamed and raged so fiercely round the foot of the cross ; how his soul that hung on that cross was pierced and stabbed with taunts and reproaches, with words of malignity and hate, sharper and keener far than the nails which had torn his hands and his feet, or the spear which should penetrate his side. We read how heathen and Jew, as in a dreadful rivalry, vied with one another, which should heap most of outrage upon the Christ of God ; the very chiefs of the Jewish nation, throwing off not merely all dignity, but all decency and decorum, and in the fierce delight of gratified hatred not caring to maintain even the religious hypocrisies which should have hindered them from openly rejoicing in the sufferings of another, being the first and foremost of all in this crucifying afresh, this moral crucifixion superinduced upon the physical, of the Son of God (Heb. vi. 6). And then, as though to crown all, St. Matthew (xxvii. 38) and St. Mark (xv. 32) relate that two fellow-sufferers with our Lord, two who, fulfilling the prophecy made long before (Isai. liii. 9, 12), were crucified with Him, fell in with and took up the taunts of the crowd, railed upon Him, mocked his pretensions, bade Him, if He were the Christ, to save Himself and them—a fearful example, whether one only, or, for a while at least, both acted thus, that the Greek proverb which ascribes to sufferings such a teaching power,¹ comes not always true, that there are whom their own sufferings and the just punishments of God do not soften, but only harden and exasperate the more ; so that they may howl upon their bed, nay, writhe upon their cross, and yet not repent them of the evil which has provoked these plagues, but only go forward, adding new sin to their old, fierce, impenitent, and defiant to the last (Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21; 2 Chron. xxviii. 22).¹

¹ Παθήματα, μολήματα, or in Latin, Nocumenta, documenta.

St. Luke, indeed, tells us that not both, but that 'one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him, saying, If Thou be Christ, save Thyself and us.' A question presents itself here, Does the statement of the earlier Evangelists, and the necessity of harmonizing the several relations, require us to assume that he, who later in the day became a penitent, joined at first in these blasphemous ravings of his fellow-malefactor and of the multitude, and only after a while separated his lot from theirs, being convinced and converted by all the wondrous evidences of a divine grace and love which shone out in the suffering Lord? To this, which of course enhances the marvel of his conversion, making it still more sudden and miraculous, many interpreters in all ages have considered themselves bound by the statements of the preceding Evangelists; as counting that only by such an assumption was it possible to reconcile St. Luke's account with theirs. Thus Chrysostom,² Theophylact, Leo the Great.³ Ambrose is more doubtful.⁴ Augustine, on the contrary, is strong that one only blasphemed,⁵ urging as a parallel

¹ The effects of crucifixion were very various on those who endured it. While the Christian martyrs would praise God from their cross, or exhort the beholders to embrace that faith for the sake of which they were willing to endure even that worst, some would spit on the bystanders (Seneca, De Vita Beata, 19), or reveal hidden iniquities of their former life, or blaspheme their judge, to render which last impossible it was not unfrequent to gag them; Cicero mentions a slave whose tongue was cut out before crucifixion for fear of inconvenient revelations which he might make from his cross (Pro Cluent. 66; cf. Justin, Hist. xxii. 7).

² See Suicer, Thes. s. v. ἁγῶν.

³ Usque ad crucem reus, fit Christi repente confessor.

⁴ Fortasse et iste prius conviciatus est.

⁵ De Cons. Evang. iii. 16.

case the words of Heb. xi. 33, 'they stopped the mouths of lions,' when, in fact, it was but one, namely Daniel, who did so; 'they were sawn asunder;' when, in all likelihood, the allusion is but to one, namely to Isaiah. His parallel cases do not seem to me very convincing, yet, on the whole, I must decidedly incline to the conclusion at which he has arrived. The internal evidence in its favour is strong. The rebuke with which the penitent malefactor rebukes his fellow is very little like that of one, who has just been partaker in the sin which he condemns. His deliberate remonstrance, with no word of reference to himself, 'Dost not thou fear God, being in the same condemnation?' sounds not at all like the remonstrance of one,—would have fitted ill, in that shape at least, to the lips of one,—who had just before been joining in the blasphemies, which all of a sudden he condemns.¹

Up to the moment when his fellow-malefactor joined in the railings of the multitude, he, we may suppose, had listened in silence; the work of grace which had begun in him sometime since, in his prison perhaps, going rapidly forward; for all around him and about him was such as would rapidly ripen a man for heaven, or for hell. The other it ripened for hell, him for heaven. He had heard all—in silence, though with deep horror of soul; but now he can keep silence no longer. There is a time to speak (Eccles. iii. 7), as well as a time to keep silence, and now for him that time has arrived. In that 'Save Thyself and us,' in that plural 'us,' the other is seeking to draw him into the same blasphemy with himself, is presenting this as the common taunt of them both. Need is therefore that he should speak, that he should separate himself off by a clear and distinct avowal from the other's sin, and not, by any longer holding his peace, become partaker of it. The English Version here, 'Dost not thou fear God?' is doubly at fault, missing the emphasis twice. Read rather, 'Neither dost thou fear God?' 'It is nothing so strange,' he would say, 'that these secure sinners, whom justice has not yet overtaken, for whom God's judgments are as yet far out of sight, should dare thus to open their mouths against the Holy One of God; but thou, upon thy cross, with such teaching as that might give thee, with such evidence as that affords that God is not mocked, that men eat the fruit of their doings, dost thou venture upon the same? neither dost thou fear God?'¹ He goes on, 'being in the same condemnation.' Two reasons are here alleged why he should have refused to become partaker of the sin of those mockers; the first, which already lay in that question we have just dealt with, that he was in condemnation, that judgment had overtaken him; the second, that Jesus was a fellow-sufferer; community of suffering might have well inspired forbearance and pity of the one for the other.

¹ Cajetan: Hæc namque verba sonant non pœnitentem convicii proprii, sed inorepantem alterius, quod simul cum aliis insultet Jesu.

And then, lest this word should seem to imply that they all shared in a common cross because they had shared in a common or like crime, he separates and distinguishes between Christ's cross and theirs. The condemnation indeed is common to all; but not so the guilt; 'and we indeed justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss; so far from having committed enormous crimes, as we have, there is no smallest fault or error in Him;'¹—another reason why he should be spared these outrages and insults. If these are for any, they are for the wicked, not for the holy.²

¹ Maldonatus: Non dubito quin bonus ille et fidelis latro perversum illum latronem cum Judæis voluerit comparare, quæ comparatio in illâ dictione nec obscure delitescit; quasi dicat, Non solum illi qui pœnâ carent, sed nec tu, qui in eadem pœnâ es, Deum times? Corn. à Lapide: Esto, Scribæ et Judæi liberi et validi non timeant Deum, ideoque subsannent Christum; tu tamen, qui in cruce torqueris et ad mortem tendis, deberes timere Deum.

Let us, before proceeding further, endeavour to realize to ourselves what manner of persons these 'malefactors' probably were, how they had deserved this name, and by the course of what crimes they had reached a Roman cross, as the end of their conversation, as the due reward of their deeds. To understand this will, I am persuaded, help us not a little to understand how one of those crucified with Jesus should, even in the hour of his own worst suffering, have turned to the Lord with scorn and defiance, the other with penitence and prayer. Both these facts may, through such an enquiry, become more intelligible to us. 'Malefactors' is the name by which St. Luke calls them; 'thieves' (according to our Version) the two earlier Evangelists; from whom, and from the blending of whose record with his, we have learned to speak of 'the penitent thief.' Our Translators would have done much better to maintain the distinction which the Scripture maintains between him, the 'robber,' or violent spoiler (see Matt. xxi. 13; xxvi. 35; Luke xxii. 52; John xviii. 40; 2 Cor. xi. 26), and the 'thief,' or secret purloiner (Matt. vi. 19; John xii. 6; 1 Thess. v. 2; Rev. iii. 3; xvi. 15). Many passages have suffered in our Version from the neglect of this distinction, but none so seriously as that with which we now have to do.¹

¹ Maldonatus: οὐδὲν ἄσπον, nihil quod virum bonum non deceat; quibus verbis indicare voluit non solum nullum magnum scelus, sed nullum etiam vel levissimum peccatum in Christo esse. Yet ἄσπον is too often used in Hellenistic Greek as a mere equivalent of ποιητής (it is joined with it, 2 Thess. iii. 2), to allow us very confidently to press this.

² Maldonatus: Cum in eadem quâ Christus pœnâ verſeris, et, quod plus est, tu quidem merito, ille vero immerito, tamen neque pœnæ societas, nec ejus te movet innocentia, ut ejus misereare.

These two were not 'thieves,' as we have called them, but robbers. Having vindicated this title for them, we may further enquire what at this time the name probably implied, and whether more than lies on the surface of the word. To answer this question aright, we must put side by side the application of the title of 'robber' to Barabbas (John xviii. 40), and the other notices of him which the Gospels supply, and read all in the light which contemporary history affords. Barabbas, this 'robber' according to St. John, was, we are told, 'a notable prisoner' (Matt. xxvii. 16); 'which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection' (Mark xv. 7); 'who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison' (Luke xxiii. 19); plainly a ringleader in one of those fierce and fanatic outbreaks against the Roman domination, which on a large scale or a small so fast succeeded one another in the latter days of the Jewish commonwealth. This at once explains how it was possible for the Chief Priests with their religious pretensions to shew the interest on his behalf which they did (Matt. xxvii. 20; Mark xv. 11), explains no less the enthusiasm with which the Jewish populace demanded his liberation (Luke xxiii. 18). He was the popular hero, who had sought to realize his own and their idea of the kingdom of God by violence and blood. He had actually been that which they wanted the Lord to be, and which because He would not be, they were now so eager to destroy Him. He had wrought, we may well believe, in that false Messias spirit, which was filling with wild and insane hopes the whole nation, and rapidly hurrying it to that final conflict with the Roman power, in which as a nation it should be for ever broken in pieces. There is every likelihood that the two malefactors crucified with Jesus belonged to the band of Barabbas. For good or for evil they knew something about the Christ, and that He was One who could deliver his own; the taunt uttered by the one expresses this, no less than the prayer of the other. There is much to make this probable. Barabbas, as we have seen, had been cast into prison 'with them that had made insurrection with him.' Two of the chief of these Pilate may have been very well pleased to send to execution on this occasion. It is abundantly plain from John xix. 15, 19-21, that he was willing in any way to retort on those who had driven him to what his conscience told him was a hideous injustice, to the condemnation (for this much he could see), of a perfectly innocent man. As he evidently sought in that title over the cross to do an extreme displeasure to the Jews, so he may have sought the same in this: 'If you compel me against my better mind to send this man to the cross, I will send, to keep him company, two of the servants of your Messiah.'

¹ On the distinction between λῃστής and κλέπτης see my Synonyms of the New Testament, § 44.

Such seems to me a more probable explanation—I

speaking but of the human explanation—of these malefactors sharing in the cross of Christ, than to suppose that the additional indignity of being thus ‘numbered with the transgressors’ was devised for Him by the Pharisees. Doubtless they were quite capable of such a malignity, and insults of exactly this character have not seldom been heaped on high-souled sufferers in the concluding scene of their lives. Thus in the French Revolution, when some noble royalist was sent to the guillotine, it was constantly managed to mix up his execution with that of forgers, highwaymen, murderers, or the like; that their shame and disgrace might, if possible, redound upon him; and this last drop of bitterness might not be wanting in his cup of pain. It is not that the Pharisees would have been behind the worst in modern times in any such subtle inventions of hate; but the ordering of malefactors to execution lay in other hands than theirs; and there is nothing to make us think that Pilate would have devised any additional insult for Him whom he would have certainly set free, if his consciousness of innumerable acts of violence and rapine and wrong, whereof the Jews might accuse him to Cæsar, had not made him the miserable coward that he was. It was the Pharisees whom he desired, so far as he dared, to wound.

Whether, indeed, Barabbas had actually played the part of a false Christ, setting himself up as the true, we have no means of knowing. It is certainly far from unlikely. Keeping in mind the significance of names in Scripture, we can hardly fail to recognize a fearful mockery in his name, Barabbas, or ‘Son of the Father;’ as though in the very name which he bore, not to speak of the work which he wrought, he should be the devil’s counterfeit and caricature of the true Holy One of God. This suggestion would acquire increased probability, if it could certainly be affirmed that he was not merely named Barabbas, but Jesus Barabbas, the lying counterpart, even to his human name, of the true Saviour of men. So, as is well known, three manuscripts, at Matt. xxvii. 17, even to this day read; and two of the older Versions, the Armenian and the Syriac; and that this was the prevailing reading in the time of Origen is sufficiently clear from some words which he uses; for, speaking of many copies in which Barabbas was not called also Jesus, he implies that, many as they were, they were still in the minority.¹ In support of this remarkable reading, which Tischendorf, Fritzsche, Meyer, Rinck² approve, but Lachmann, Alford, Tregelles³ reject, it may be urged, that while we can scarcely conceive anyone daring to introduce the sacred name of Jesus, to give it to Barabbas, while it is difficult, almost impossible, to imagine such a thought suggesting itself to the mind of any, we can very well understand that many transcribers should have been shocked to find it there; and marring the text, which they impertinently sought to mend, have ventured to omit it. Certainly too, it must be allowed that there appear vestiges of the existence of such a reading in the text as it now stands; the words, 'which is called Christ,' twice introduced after the human name of our blessed Lord on the occasions when Barabbas is brought into opposition to Him (Matt. xxvii. 17, 22), and nowhere else, seem to be employed by Pilate out of a necessity to distinguish between Him and another who bore the name of Jesus as well. It is at first strangely startling to think that this identity of name could possibly have existed; and yet He who bore every other scorn and shame, why should He not have also borne this?

¹ In multis exemplaribus non continetur quod Barabbas etiam Jesus dicebatur, et forsitan recte, ut ne nomen Jesus conveniat alicui iniquorum.

² Lucub. Crit. p. 285.

³ On the Printed Text of the Greek Testament, p. 194.

All which has just been said being kept in remembrance, it will surprise us less, that so many elements of nobleness should display themselves in strength in one of these malefactors, than if we regarded him merely as a criminal of that meaner stamp whom we designate as a thief, or even as a robber, in our ordinary use of that word. His had been no petty larcenies; as little in all likelihood had he meant at the beginning to have his living by violence and wrong. Those whom the Romans with a certain amount of truth called 'robbers,' were oftentimes wild and stormy zealots, maintaining in arms a last and hopeless protest against that yoke of the stranger, which God had imposed on his people for the chastisement of their sins, and which therefore it behoved them meekly to accept. This may have been one of these, seeking at the outset of his career to work by the wrath of man what he counted the righteousness of God.¹ Presently a fugitive from Roman justice, compelled to take to the mountains, and to live there by rapine, he may have gradually learned less and less to discriminate between friend and foe, may have earned only too well the title under which he was at last to expiate his offences on a Roman cross.

His own confession implies as much (ver. 41). How easily, under such conditions, those who have begun with quite another aim degenerate into banditti, how imperceptibly and yet how surely the outlaw melts into the brigand, the story of Dolcino's Apostolicals, as of the Camisards in the Cevennes, abundantly teaches us ; while in the history of Jephthah we see how under more favourable circumstances this freebooter may rise into the chief and champion of his people (Judg. xi. 3, 11). He would do this the more easily, inasmuch as he would never by his lawless occupation have wholly forfeited his own respect or the respect of his fellow-countrymen ; David, indeed, himself for a while was little better than such a freebooter as this (1 Sam. xxii. 2). Least of all would he forfeit this at a time when the whole framework of social life was dislocated and disjointed as it was at this period in Judæa ; and when the disorganization of society seemed half to justify acts which would have been wholly unjustifiable at another time. It is easy to perceive how a class like this, while it would enlist some among the worst, would also gather some into its ranks who, though miserably perverted now, might under more favourable circumstances have stood forth among the noblest of their age and nation. It is not altogether unlikely that an apostle of the Lord, Simon Zelotes, had been, as his name would indicate, on the very verge of becoming one of these ; until in Christ he had found a more excellent way, had discovered that the truth, and the truth only, could make him free, or help him to make others free. But these worst and best, however they might accidentally be yoked together, and called by a common name, would yet only be waiting for some contact with the truth, to reveal themselves in the essential differences of their character, differences which up to that decisive moment may have been concealed alike from others and from themselves. So it fared with this malefactor and the other. The decisive moment had now arrived. Heaven and hell claimed each its own. Of these two, so long yokefellows in evil, it was manifest at length that one had in him that which was akin to and was drawn to the light; the other, that which hated the light, repelled the light, and was in return repelled by it into a yet deeper darkness of its own.¹

¹ In the record by Josephus of the final agony of Jerusalem the ζηλωτής and the λποτής become nearly, or indeed altogether, convertible terms; thus see B. J. iv. passim.

Few as are the words which this penitent utters in his brief address to his fellow-sinner, and then in his still briefer to his Saviour, they yet are sufficient to reveal to us a most authentic work of grace going forward within him. He is, in the first place, deeply convinced of his sin. There is no more certain sign of an effectual work of the Holy Spirit of God than a readiness on the sinner's part to accept and acquiesce in his punishment, whatever that punishment may be, to put his mouth in the dust, and to say, 'Thou art righteous, O God, that doest this;' 'Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sin?' (Lam. iii. 19; cf. Ezra ix. 6, 7; Luke xv. 18, 19) while, on the other hand, there can be no surer token of an impenitent and obdurate heart than the refusal of the sinner to receive correction, to humble himself under the mighty hand of God (Isai. i. 5; ix. 10; Jer. v. 3; Luke xv. 14, 15; Rev. ix. 21; xvi. 21). And this man even in that bitter cross saw nothing more than he had earned, 'the due reward of his deeds.' How profound the conviction, how unreserved upon his part is the confession, of sin!

¹ There are many apocryphal legends about these two robbers; which may be found in Thilo, Codex Apocryphus, pp. 93, 143, 580. Their very names are there given, but variously, Dimas, or Dysmas, and Gestas, Titus and Dumachus; this last possibly a corruption of Θεομάχος. In one of these legends it is told how the converted robber more than thirty years before had allowed the blessed Virgin and her Child to pass unharmed on their flight to Egypt, against the desire of the other, who would have despoiled the fugitives.

And then how many other principal graces show themselves actively working in him¹—all compressed, it is true, and this by the very necessities of the case, within the narrowest limits of time; but in their intension making up for what in extension they have not and cannot have. Ignorant he may very well have been of that special precept in Moses' law, 'Thou shalt in any case rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him' (Lev. xix. 17); but love is the fulfilling of the law, and love will not suffer him to keep silence now. They two may in times past have been frequent partners in guilt, associates in many a deed of violence and wrong, strengthening one another in wickedness; but now, himself a penitent, he would fain lead his fellow-sinner by the same blessed path of contrition, repentance, and faith, which he himself is treading.

And then, too, what courage, what boldness speaks out in his confession of Christ, in his declaration, 'This man hath done nothing amiss;' and still more in his open turning to Him as the one Helper and Saviour. Some perhaps might be tempted to rejoin, that at such a moment this did not cost him much, that for him, hanging on that cross, and doomed before many hours there to expire, the motives which would operate on others, the fear of men's reproach, the desire of their applause, must all have alike passed away. But this is a great mistake, as will be evident if only we call to mind how often men, above all those who know no higher support, have in such a dreadful hour sustained themselves to the last on the sympathies of the beholders, when they have known these to be theirs; how bold bad men, mainly upheld by these, have gone down with no sign of weakness, but as with flying colours, to hell. So far from costing him nothing, it must have required a mighty effort upon his part to separate himself, as now no doubt he did, from all the sympathies of all who surrounded his cross, and thus openly to cast in his lot with the crucified Galilæan. Hitherto, as a victim of Roman justice, as one of the 'robbers' described just now, that is, as one of the latest champions of Jewish freedom, a member probably of the band of Barabbas, and sharing in the popular interest which he excited, this man had been an object of sympathy and admiration to all the scorers and blasphemers of Calvary. He would have become so still more, openly joining, as his companion did, in their insults and outrages against the Holy One of God. But to all this he prefers the reproach of Christ, which surely he did not escape, when he made that bold confession of his faith, 'Lord, remember me, when Thou comest into Thy kingdom.'

¹ Thus Gregory the Great (Moral. xviii. 40): Libet mentis oculos ad illum latronem reducere, qui de fauce diaboli ascendit crucem, de cruce paradisum. Intueamur qualis ad patibulum venerit, et a patibulo qualis abcessit.... In corde fidelium tres summopere manere virtutes testatur Apostolus, dicens, Nunc autem manent fides, spes, caritas. Quas cunctas subitâ repletus gratiâ et accepit latro, et servavit in cruce. Fidem namque habuit, qui regnaturum Dominum credidit, quem secum pariter morientem vidit. Spem habuit, qui regni ejus aditum postulavit, dicens, Memento mei, Domine, dum veneris in regnum tuum. Caritatem quoque in morte suâ vivaciter tenuit, qui fratrem et collatorem pro simili scelere morientem, et de iniquitate suâ arguit, et ei vitam quam cognoverat, prædicavit, dicens, Neque tu times Deum, etc.

And if other graces manifest themselves in him, yet more than all other what a wondrous faith proclaims itself in these words of his. To believe that He, whose only token of royalty was the crown of thorns that still clung to his bleeding brows, was a king, and had a kingdom,¹ to believe that He, on whose own eyes the mists of death were already hanging, was indeed the Prince of life, wielding in those pierced hands, nailed so helplessly to the cross, the keys of death and of hell, that He could shut and none could open, could open and none could shut; that it could profit something in that mysterious world whither they both were hastening to be remembered by this crucified man—that was a faith indeed. What was the faith of any other to his faith? Everything seemed to give the lie to Christ's pretensions. Disciples and apostles themselves had fallen away and fled. They had trusted once, but they trusted no more, 'that it was He which should have redeemed Israel' (Luke xxiv. 21). They had now renounced that hope; and, indeed, every other hope; and then, in the midst of this universal unbelief, one, all whose anterior life might seem to have unfitted him for this heroic act of faith, does homage, not indeed in outward act, for his limbs are nailed to the tree, but in heart and word, to Jesus as the King of Israel, as the Lord of the spirits of all flesh. Truly we may say of his faith that it was itself one of the miracles of the crucifixion;² that in his conversion we have one of those glimpses of glory with which the Father is ever careful to light up the deepest depths of the humiliation of the Son.

¹ Bengel: Regem profitetur, talem, qui mortuus mortuo benefacere possit.

² Augustine often magnifies the faith which breaks forth thus unexpectedly in this man, as a bright sun from behind thickest clouds. Thus (Serm. 232): Magna fides; huic fidei quid addi possit, ignoro. Titubaverunt ipsi qui viderunt Christum mortuos suscitantem; credidit ille qui videbat secum in ligno pendentem. Quando illi titubaverunt, tunc ille credidit. Qualem fructum Christus de arido ligno percepit? . . . Non solum credebatur resurrecturum, sed etiam regnaturum. Pendenti, crucifixo, cruento, hærenti, Cum veneris, inquit, in regnum tuum. Et illi, Nos sperabamus [Luc. xxiv. 21]. Ubi spem latro invenit, discipulus perdidit. Compare Serm. 285.

But it will be well worth while to look a little closer and more in detail at his words. 'Lord' need not in itself be more than a general term of respectful address; it is oftentimes this, and nothing further; thus Matt. xxv. 20, 24; John iv. 11; xii. 21; xx. 15, and elsewhere. But it may have a much deeper, and a theological meaning; and such no doubt it possesses here. For without assuming, which would indeed be absurd, that this untaught man meant by his 'Lord' all which we mean by Jehovah or Lord, yet was there on his part the recognition of a divine character in Christ. His 'Lord' of itself would not be sufficient to prove this, but only as it is read in the light of what follows, 'Remember me, when Thou comest into thy kingdom.' For that 'Remember me' is no mere counterpart of Joseph's petition to the chief butler of Pharaoh (Gen. xl. 14; cf. Ecclus. xxxvii. 6), but is itself a prayer, even as the prayers of the Jews constantly clothed themselves in this same form (Nehem. xiii. 14, 22, 31, and often in the Psalms; for another kind of remembrance see Rev. xvi. 19). But seeing that it was now at length abundantly evident that Christ's kingdom was not here, nor on this side of the grave, it must have been plainly in the glory of some kingdom to be revealed hereafter that he desired, through Christ's remembrance of him, a part.

The words themselves of his prayer should not stand exactly as in the English Version they do. Our Translators have on various occasions failed to mark the distinction between the prepositions equivalent in the Greek to our 'into' and 'in;'¹ seldom however incurring thereby so grave a loss as here. It is not, 'when Thou comest into thy kingdom,' as though Christ's kingdom could even in thought be contemplated as apart from Himself; but, 'when Thou comest in thy kingdom,'—the words are correctly rendered at Matt. xvi. 28—'when Thou shalt appear as a king with all thy royalties around Thee and about thee, the angels ten thousand times ten thousand with Thee, and Thyself the centre of all' (Dan. vii. 15; Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Thess. i. 7; Jude 14). Christ does not and cannot come into his kingdom; He comes in it and with it, brings his kingdom with Him, and where He is, there is his kingdom too.² He who could ask this had taken in what Pilate could not take in, that this man was a king, and that He would one day return to establish his kingdom upon earth.³

Leo the Great (Serm. 51: Quæ istam fidem exhortatio persuasit? quæ doctrina inbuit? quis prædicator accendit? Non viderat prius acta miracula; cessaverat tunc languentium curatio, cæcorum illuminatio, vivificatio mortuorum; ea ipsa quæ mox erant gerenda non aderant; et tamen Dominum confitetur et Regem, quem videt suppli-ii sui esse consortem.

The reply of our Lord is a glorious example of what

¹ Thus εἰς has not its proper meaning, Rom. v. 5; nor ἐν, Rom. ii. 5; v. 21. On this, which is a fault common to many Versions of the New Testament, see Winer, Gramm. § liv. 4, 5, 6.

² Maldonatus forsakes his Vulgate, which, sharing the error of our Version and of so many other, has here, in regnum tuum; but he: ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ σου, in regno tuo. Itaque non est sensus, Cum veneris ad regnandum, sed, Cum veneris, jam regnans; cum veneris, non ad acquirendum regnum, sed regno jam acquisito, quemadmodum venturus ad iudicium est.

³ In the Evangelium Nicodemi (pars 2^a, c. 10) the petition put into the mouth of this penitent, though substantially the same, is formally different. It is as follows: Κύριε, ὅτε [ὅταν?] βασιλεύσεις, μὴ μόν ἐπιλάβῃς. As that apocryphal gospel dates probably as early as the second century, it is just possible that the difference here may, as Tischendorf (Evangelia Apocrypha, p. lxix.) suggests, represent another tradition of the words (verba latronis ita discedunt a Lucæ textu, ut ex aliâ veterrimâ traditione fluxisse videntur); but to me it seems far more probable that we have here no more than a not perfectly accurate recollection of the words as they stand in St. Luke.

we may not unfitly call the prodigalities of the kingdom of heaven, of the answers to prayer, infinitely larger and more liberal than the suppliant in the boldest ventures of faith had dared to suggest. In two points the granting of this suppliant's petition immeasurably transcends the petition itself. All which he had been bold to ask, was that he might be remembered of the Lord. But one may remember the absent, may do them good at a distance, and keeping them at distance still. This to have done would have fulfilled the measure of all which he had desired. But for him, the first-fruits of the cross, the first who should set his seal to that word of the prophecy, 'I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me,' for him Christ has better than remembrance in store; far better than this—'thou shalt be with Me.'

And not this only; he shall be with Him on that very day.¹ Christ's 'to-day,' besides containing an announcement of his own departure out of this world within the limits of that day, contains also a pledge and promise for this poor pardoned sinner, that he too should find speedy release from all his agonies—a release indeed far speedier than according to common probabilities he might have looked for. Crucifixion, with all its sufferings, was so little mortal, that persons taken down from their cross, and duly cared for, have been known to recover. In the lingering torture of this punishment the seats of life were so little assailed, that it was by no means an uncommon case for criminals to expire at length of mere hunger on their cross; while, besides the breaking of the legs, by which the death of these two was hastened, various other methods were occasionally employed for accelerating, when this was thought desirable, the fatal close. They were sometimes suffocated by the smoke of fires lighted below, or were torn in pieces by wild beasts. But for him within a few brief hours, before that day had closed, it should be well. He should be at rest, and more than this—in Paradise and joy. The coming of Christ in his kingdom might very well be a remote contingency. In all likelihood this petitioner more or less looked onward to it as such. But it is no remote boon which the Lord will bestow upon him; that very day he shall taste the sweetness of it: *'To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise.'*¹

¹ This is often urged by Augustine; thus Serm. 232: Quid ei dixerit Dominus audiamus: Amen, dico tibi, hodie tecum eris in Paradiso. Tu differs te; ego agnosco te; . . . invasisti in regnum cælorum; vim fecisti, credidisti, rapuisti. Non te differo; tantæ fidei hodie reddo quod debeo. Compare Serm. 327. 2. Instead of the rich and pregnant brevity of that prayer and this answer to that prayer, the Narratio Josephi (Tischendorf, Evangelia Apocrypha, p. 442) puts a speech of twenty lines into the mouth of the penitent, and one somewhat longer into that of our Lord.

We must not, however, dismiss without further notice a word on which so much has been written, a promise the form of which in times past has perplexed not a few. As many, indeed, as assume 'Paradise' to be equivalent to heaven, and, in fact, identical with the kingdom of glory, cannot fail to find a difficulty here, inasmuch as Christ Himself was not on that day in heaven, but in Hades; and these suggest various ways of escaping from this perplexity; which, however, is one of their own creating. A not unfrequent one is the separation of 'to-day' from the words which follow, with the joining of it to those which precede: 'Verily, I say unto thee to-day, thou shalt be with Me in Paradise." Theophylact says of those who offer this explanation, that they 'do violence to the words;' a judgment, I think, in which most will concur.* By others, who in like manner make Paradise equivalent to heaven, or at least fail to see its identity with Hades, or rather with the happier half of Hades, it is said that however his human soul was that day in this latter place, yet, according to his divine nature everywhere present, He was in Paradise,—that is, as they understand it, in heaven.

¹ The promise of these words can hardly fail to remind us of another 'Thou shalt be with me,' Samuel's to Saul (1 Sam. xxviii. 19); that also in Sheol, in the world of spirits; but that announcement how unlike to this; as full of fear and terror as this is of hope and joy.

This is the usual interpretation in the early Church,⁴ and in the medieval,⁵ and generally in the modern Roman

¹ In the Evangelium Nicodemi, 26, the words are actually transposed, and stand thus, σήμερον λέγω σοι, μετ' ἐμοῦ κ.τ.λ.

² Ἐκβιάσονται τὸ ῥῆμα.

³ The first I know who makes mention of this way of escape from an imaginary difficulty is Hesychius, a presbyter of Jerusalem, who probably wrote in the fifth-century (Quæst. 47): *πῶς ἡ ὑπόσχεσις τοῦ Κυρίου πρὸς τὸν ληστὴν πεπλήρωται, ὅτι σήμερον μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔσῃ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ; Μετὰ γὰρ τὸν σταυρὸν ὁ Χριστὸς εἰς Ἀΐδου ἐπὶ τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ τῶν νεκρῶν παραγίνεται. Ἰδεὶ δὲ καὶ τὸν ληστὴν (scil. παραγίνεσθαι εἰς Ἀΐδου), ὑπέθνηον ὅντα τῷ νόμῳ τῆς φύσεως. He goes on to state, but does not approve of, this solution: *τινὲς μὲν οὕτως ἀναγινώσκουσιν, Ἀμὴν λέγω σοι σήμερον εἰτα ἐπιφέρουσιν, ὅτι μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔσῃ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ.

⁴ Thus Augustine (Ep. ad Dardanum, 187); and this, although he has excellently well prepared the way for the right explanation by the distinction which he draws between Paradise, the waiting place of happy spirits, and heaven, or the kingdom of glory (restat igitur ut in inferno intelligatur esse paradisus, ubi erat illo die futurus esse secundum humanam animam Christus). This, however, he suggests only to abandon it again, and to take refuge in the omnipresence of Christ, who according to his divine nature was everywhere, and therefore that day in heaven. For similar explanations of the Greek Fathers see Suicer, Theol. s. v. ληστής.

⁵ Anselm in one of his deeply pathetic Orationes (the 42nd) expresses himself thus: Et quid hoc est, o rex desiderabilis? Tu clavis affigeris, et paradisum promittis. Tu pendes in ligno, et latroni dicis, Hodie mecum eris in paradiso! Et, o desiderium animarum, ubi est paradisu, quia dicis latroni, Hodie mecum eris in paradiso? An paradisu tecum est, et ubi tu vis, paradisu est? An tu indubitanter paradisu es, quia tam confidenter promittis, Hodie mecum eris in paradiso? Credo, Domine, credo certe quod ubi tu vis, et ubi tu es, ibi paradisu est; et esse tecum, hoc est esse in paradiso. Compare Aquinas, Sum. Theol. 3^a, 52. 4.

Catholic.¹ But it is not universal. Severus, the great leader of the Monophysites, has seen his way perfectly here;² the only drawback to his exposition of this passage being that he makes Paradise here absolutely, and, so to speak, locally, identical with the Garden of innocence of our first parents; the truth being that in the evolution of theology in the later Jewish schools that Garden had lent a name to the happy place where the souls of the faithful, released from the burden of the flesh, are waiting their perfect consummation and bliss; and that it is of this Paradise our blessed Lord is speaking. Jeremy Taylor³ has traced excellently well the history of the word, and what upon his lips it signified now: ‘Our blessed Saviour told the converted thief that he should “that day be with Him in Paradise.” Now without peradventure He spake so as He was to be understood, meaning by “Paradise” that which the schools and pulpits of the Rabbies did usually speak of it. By “Paradise” till the time of Esdras it is certain the Jews only meant that blessed garden in which God once placed Adam and Eve; but in the time of Esdras, and so downward, when they spake distinctly of things to happen after this life, and began to signify their new discoveries and modern philosophy by names, they called the state of souls expecting the resurrection of their bodies by the name of Gan Eden, the garden of Eden. . . . It is therefore more than probable that when the converted thief heard our blessed Saviour speak of Paradise, or Gan Eden, he who was a Jew and heard that on that day he should be there, understood the meaning to be that he should be there where all the good Jews did believe the souls of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to be placed.'

¹ Corn. a Lapide: Certum enim est Christum cum latrone die illo quo obiit non ascendisse in cælum, sed descendisse ad limbum patrum; ibique eis visionem suæ divinitatis impertivisse, itaque eos beasse; quare tunc Christus eorum sortes mutavit; fecit enim ut limbus esset paradisi, ut inferi essent superi, ut infernus esset cælum. Ubi enim est Christus, ibi est paradisi; ubi est visio Dei et beatitudo, ibi est cælum.

² Valuable fragments of his Commentary on St. Luke are preserved in Cramer's Catena. A few words of his on this matter I will quote: τὸ δὲ ἀληθὲς τῆς ἐξηγήσεως, τοῦτό ἐστι· τὰ ἐπηγγελμένα ἡμῖν ἀγαθὰ βασιλεία ἐστὶν οὐρανῶν, οὐχὶ ἡ εἰς τὸν παράδεισον εἰσοδος, ἢ ἡ ἐπάνοδος. ἀλλ’ ἰσως ἐρεῖ τις ὡς ταῦτόν ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν καὶ ὁ παράδεισος, δύο προσσηγοριῶν οὐσῶν περὶ ἐν πρᾶγμα τὸ ὑποκείμενον. ἀλλ’ ἡ τῶν ἱερῶν γραμμάτων διδασκαλία δεικνύειν ὡς οὐ ταῦτόν ἐστιν, ἀλλ’ ἑκατέρου πολὺ τὸ διάφορον. Having vindicated the higher dignity of the βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, he proceeds: ἡ δὲ ἐργασία τοῦ παραδείσου βανανός τις οὐκ ἦν, ἀλλ’ εἶχε λογικὴν εὐφροσύνην ἀναμεμυγμένην καὶ ἑνωῶν θεῶν ἀπόλαυσιν. Ὡστε ὁ ληστής τοῦ μὲν παραδείσου τετύχηκεν· τὰ δὲ ἐν ἑλπίσει τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν μετὰ τῶν ἀπ’ αἰῶνος δικαίων οὐκ ἐκομίσαστο, τοῦ Θεοῦ περὶ ἡμῶν κρείττονι τι προβλεψαμένον, ἵνα μὴ χωρὶς ἡμῶν τελευθῶσι.

³ A Funeral Sermon on Sir George Dalston.

This is the only occasion during the days of his flesh on which (so far at least as we know), Paradise was made mention of by our Lord. Once too He mentions it in his glory (Rev. ii. 7), and once it is on the lips of his chief apostle (2 Cor. xii. 4). These are the only times that it occurs in the New Testament. Hanging on the accursed tree his thoughts may well have travelled back to another tree, even the tree of life, standing in the Paradise of God;¹ in that Paradise, which by all this travail and sore agony He was at this instant winning back for the children of men, quenching in his own blood that fiery flaming sword which, since the sin and sentence of Adam, had kept it against them; even as he was opening for them the gates of another Paradise, and, as a Stronger, wresting from the strong one the keys of death and of hell (Rev. i. 18).

¹ Bengel: In paradiso: in quo feliciores arbores quam in Golgatha; cum immortalitate, Rev. ii. 7.

As I cannot but hope that materials for sermons may sometimes be sought in these Studies, I will not bring this one to a close without one or two practical observations. There is sometimes a tendency to regard the grace vouchsafed to this penitent as exceptional, as not to be brought within the ordinary laws of God's dealings with the children of men. We may sometimes hear it said, that as that moment when the Son of God hung upon the cross was a moment unlike every other in the moral and spiritual history of the world, so there were graces vouchsafed then, unlike those of any other moment, larger, freer, more marvellous; such as were proper to that time and no other; the gates of mercy being, so to speak, thrown open more widely than at other times; and that therefore no conclusions can be drawn from what then found place as to what will find place when events have returned to their more ordinary course. This is sometimes urged, and chiefly out of a desire to withdraw the temptation to a deferred and late repentance, which the acceptance of this penitent at the closing moment of his life might else seem to hold out to others. I confess that even the desire to avert such an abuse, cannot persuade me to accept this explanation of the grace which he obtained. The laws of God's kingdom, the conditions under which grace may be obtained, are unchangeable. This man was accepted and forgiven exactly on the same grounds as those on which any other will find pardon and acceptance, because he repented, and believed, and obeyed. Time does not exist for God; and if only this repentance, faith, and obedience of his were genuine, whether they were spread over the forty or fifty years to which his life in the natural course of things might have been prolonged, or concentrated into the few hours upon the cross which he actually did survive, this made and could make no difference in God's sight. I have said, 'if only these were genuine,' which in the present instance we know that certainly they were; for this is the fatal danger of all repentance postponed to the last, and thus withdrawn from all trial and proof, that the man, little as he may guess this, may be deceiving himself; that in all likelihood his repentance is not genuine, is not sincere; that almost certainly it is not so, when it has been deferred on so mean a speculation as this, of giving to God the least and obtaining from Him the most, grinding the corn of life, and, according to the old proverb, giving the flour to the devil, and only the bran to God. It is by the pressing of this, the almost universal self-delusion of death-bed repentances, that we must rescue this Scripture from dangerous abuse, from proving a temptation and a snare, not by excepting the dealing of God with this man from the category of his usual dealings in the kingdom of his grace and power.

One word more. We have admired, and with abundant reason, the faith of the poor penitent, who could believe, even in such an hour as that was, in the royalties of Christ, that the title set in bitter mockery over his head, spake nothing more than the truth, that He was a king, and would yet come in his kingdom, and that it would be well with them who should be then remembered of Him. But let us not finally take leave of this history without reverently admiring also his faith to whom this prayer was addressed, his confidence, not to be shaken by all which was happening round Him, which was finding place within Him, in his divine Sonship; his, who could believe that, crucified through weakness, He was yet Lord over all, that all things had been delivered into his hands by his Father, that He could grant to this suppliant for his favour all which he asked, and much more than he asked; who dispensed as confidently his favours from that cross of shame as the kings of the earth dispense theirs from their thrones of glory; who in this promise claimed and avouched all worlds as his own. Not when the victory had been already won, and He had been declared to be the Son of God with power by the Resurrection from the dead (Rom. i. 4), did He say to the beloved apostle, 'I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore; and have the keys of death and of hell' (Rev. i. 18), with a calmer and more majestic confidence than to this poor suppliant man He declares in the hour of his own agony, 'To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise.' Truly this is the Lord of life; and then, when He thus spake, was gloriously fulfilled that which so many of the early Fathers thought they found written as a prophecy of the triumphs of the cross in the 96th Psalm, and which is equally true whether there fore-announced or not, Regnavit a ligno Deus.

16. CHRIST AND THE TWO DISCIPLES ON THE WAY TO EMMAUS.

Mark xvi. 12, 13; Luke xxiv. 13—35.

WE have a slight hint of this beautiful little history, and indeed the history itself, but in barest outline, at Mark xvi. 12. He has there very much such a summary abridgement of it as he has of the Temptation elsewhere (i. 12, 13). At the same time, for the breadth and fullness of detail, which render it one of the most interesting records of the Great Forty Days, we are altogether indebted to St. Luke.

The Resurrection had taken place already; but the disciples had refused to credit it. The Sun of Righteousness, which seemed to have set forever, had again risen with healing on his wings; but the disciples, not without grave fault of their own, are walking on in darkness still, in a darkness which in some sort they have made for themselves. So it fares with these two, of whom we here read: 'And behold, two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about threescore furlongs.' The name of one of these favoured wayfarers we learn a little further on. It was Cleopas (ver. 18), who must not be identified with the Cleopas of John xix. 25.¹ Who the other might be we are not told.

¹ This Κλεόπας is short for Κλεόπατρος, while that (Κλωπᾶς) is an Aramaic name.

Apostle he certainly was not; and those who suggest Bartholomew or James cannot reconcile this with the fact that the two report the mysterious interview to the Eleven (ver. 23), could not therefore themselves belong to the Eleven. Neither is it at all likely that the unnamed disciple was St. Luke himself; for this, again, seems scarcely reconcilable with the announcement of the Evangelist that the account which he gives in his Gospel was delivered to him by those who were 'eyewitnesses,' as well as 'ministers of the word' (i. 2); herein implicitly affirming that such 'eyewitness' he had not himself been, that he had not himself beheld, as these two beheld, the risen Lord. Jerome and others suppose that they may both have been of the Seventy; which is probable enough; but we cannot affirm it with any certainty. The village of Emmaus, north of Jerusalem, and mentioned by Josephus,¹ to which they were journeying, ought not to be confounded, as it has often been, with another Emmaus in the plain of Judæa, and not 'threescore furlongs,' or something more than seven miles, from Jerusalem, but not less than twenty from the capital city. All modern attempts to discover the site of this village have been unsuccessful.

'And they talked together of all these things which had happened. And it came to pass that, while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus Himself drew near, and went with them. But their eyes were holden, that they should not know Him' (cf. John xx. 14; xxi. 4). While St. Mark seems to lay the cause of the non-recognition of the Lord on the part of his disciples to his changed appearance ('after that He appeared in another form unto two of them'), St. Luke finds it rather in their 'holden eyes.'¹ 'And He said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?'² From more than one word here, we may take it for granted that the two disciples were in earnest debate; not unduly striving nor contending; but still regarding from different points of view, and each urging upon the other his own interpretation of, that stupendous event, of which they had just been the witnesses. To them thus earnestly debating, and allowing this earnestness to shew itself in their outward mien, the Lord joined Himself, in guise the most unpretending, as a fellow-traveller on the same road with themselves; but at the same time as one himself interested in the matter which could interest them so strongly, and moved no less by the settled sadness of their countenances; and who, out of no idle curiosity, would fain learn, if this might be permitted, what it was that stirred and saddened them so much.

¹ B. J. vii. 6. 6.

The two disciples, as I think we may gather from their reply, were not perfectly pleased to be accosted, and interrupted in their confidential discourse with one another, by one who seemed to have no right to meddle with the sacredness of their sorrow. They cannot forbear ex-

¹ The two statements are excellently reconciled by St. Augustine (Serm. 239. 2): Alia enim effigies visa est, retentis oculis non apertis.

² 'And are sad' is hardly an adequate rendering of καὶ ἔστε σκυθρωποί, though it might be difficult to improve it. Σκυθρωπός, occurring in the New Testament only here and at Matt. vi. 16 (where Basil the Great exchanges it well with συννέζων), and in the Old at Gen. xl. 7: Dan. i. 10; Sirac. xxv. 23, from σκυρός (and that from σκιζομαι) and ἔψ, is better expressed by the German 'traurig,' as it would be by our own 'dreary,' if 'dreary' still kept the exact force which it had at the beginning; see for this in Richardson's English Dictionary the quotation from Gower; another in Richard of Hampole's Pricke of Conscience:

'Now es a man light, now es he hevy,

Now es he blithe, now es he dreary.'

It expresses the downcast look of a settled grief, pain, or displeasure.

pressing their surprise that such a question should have been put to them: 'And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering said unto Him, Art thou only a stranger at Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days?' The English Version is not here perfectly satisfactory. It seems to attribute the questioner's ignorance of what must be the cause of their grief to his being 'a stranger' or sojourner at Jerusalem. But, not to say that such an event as the rejection and crucifixion of one who claimed to be the Messiah must have been just as well known to the pilgrims at the feast as to the actual dwellers at Jerusalem, the words will not bear this meaning. They are not without a certain difficulty; but on the whole it will be best and simplest to render the first clause in the sentence thus, 'Dost thou lodge alone at Jerusalem?' 'Dwellest thou,' that is, 'in solitude there, apart from the busy concourse of men, and thus so withdrawn from acquaintance with all which is passing in the city, that no tidings have reached thee of the mighty and marvellous events which within the last few days have befallen?' The disciples, in the all-absorbing interest which those events have for them, take for granted that, if only known, they must have the same for every other; and they have, moreover, been so blown abroad, that nothing but an absolute isolation from all company with his fellow-men can have hindered their questioner from having knowledge of them.¹

¹ Beza: Tu solus commoraris Hierosolymis? with a shifting of the emphasis from παροικεῖς to μόνος. All which could be urged against this rendering is that παροικεῖς thus fails to obtain its full force, and is too much rendered as though it were κατοικεῖς: but the other explanations, such as are offered by Theophylact, Castalio (quoted by Beza), Meyer, and others, seem to me either absolutely untenable, or encumbered with far more serious difficulties than is this.

The Lord's answer, 'What things?' is exactly adapted to draw from the disciples a further communication. Had He replied that He knew, this would naturally have prevented Cleopas from entering further into a matter already familiar to his interrogator; and, of course, He could not answer that He did not know. His question serves the purpose for which it was intended: 'And they said unto Him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people' (cf. Acts vii. 22). From this answer of theirs it is evident that the mystery of Christ's divine nature was hidden from them as yet; or if at any time they had caught glimpses of it, these now were completely obscured by the thick shadows which during the last days had closed around their Lord. Jesus was to them 'a prophet,' and, as we presently see, the prophet, He that 'should have redeemed Israel,' the Messiah therefore; but the Jewish anticipations of a Messiah (and they had not lifted themselves above these), did not involve more than glorious human prerogatives. That Messiah should come, and that God should come, they expected both; but that both promises should be fulfilled in one and the same person, that these two stars of hope, which had lighted Israel through long ages of gloom, should in the actual fulfilment blend and become one star, this was a mystery hidden, we may say, or almost hidden, from prophets and kings, from those who most waited for the consolation of Israel.

They go on to complain of the reception which, notwithstanding all these glorious manifestations of his power both in word and work, He had found from the spiritual chiefs of the people: 'and how the Chief Priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified

Him. But we trusted' (they speak of it as a trust which they must now renounce, which indeed they have renounced), 'that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel.'¹ To say, as some do, that this redemption which they looked for at the hands of the Messiah was merely a deliverance from the yoke of their worldly oppressors, is certainly a mistake. It may have been thus with many; but there were always those who understood that the deliverance must reach much deeper than this; that to be a redemption worth the name, it must be a redemption from sin, from the bondage of unruly appetites and inordinate desires. It was indeed true that this deliverance would necessarily, in God's good providence, have drawn after it that other deliverance; that if Israel had turned to God, and welcomed his Anointed, the yoke of its Roman lords would, in one way or another, have soon been broken from its neck; for this bondage was but an echo of the other; and thus the faithful in Israel may very possibly have blended, in all likelihood did blend, the two deliverances into one; but still this outward redemption was not in their thoughts the beginning, still less was it the whole, of the redemption. In the prophecy of the father of the Baptist the two redemptions, from the yoke of evil and from the yoke of their foreign oppressors, are wonderfully blended together. He whom God shall raise up, a horn of salvation for his people, shall deliver them from their enemies; but this, that they may serve Him in righteousness and true holiness all the days of their life (Luke i. 68-79; cf. John viii. 31-36).

¹ Augustine (Serm. 235. § 2): Quando enim cum illis fuerat ante passionem, omnia prædixerat, passurum se fuisse, moriturum, tertio die resurrecturum; omnia prædixerat; sed mors illius, illorum oblivio fuit. Sic perturbati sunt, quando eum viderunt in ligno pendentem, ut obliviscerentur docentem, non expectarent resurgentem, nec tenerent promittentem. Nos, inquiunt, sperabamus quia ipse erat redempturus Israël. O discipuli, sperabatis? ergo jam non speratis.

They go on: 'And besides all this,' in addition to that cruel death inflicted on Him by our rulers, and sufficiently explaining the sadness which Thou hast noted in us, 'to-day is the third day since these things were done.' We might have had some glimpses of hope up to this present time, seeing that while He was alive, He more than once uttered mysterious words not merely about his own death, words which we have found only too true, but also about a triumphant reversal of that doom of death, mysterious words about what should happen on the third day after his death; but this day has arrived, and is unmarked by any change.' How much unbelief is there here. The third day has come, but it has not gone; and how could they be sure that He had not already made good his words? indeed, there was much to render it likely that He had. Their own words which follow imply as much: 'Yea, and certain women of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre. And when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that He was alive' (ver. 1-10; John xx. 1, 2). The hesitating, doubting disciples will not confidently affirm of this that it was a mere subjective imagination of these women; as little pledge themselves to its objective reality. They speak of it therefore as 'a vision of angels,' leaving this matter undecided. They go on to tell of the visit of Peter and John to the sepulchre; 'and certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said.' But, having thus stated all which gave them warrant for hope, they yet leave off with the mournful, desponding words—‘but Him they saw not’ (cf. ver. 12; John xx. 3-10).

They have poured out all their hearts before Him. It is now his turn to speak. He still, indeed, preserves his incognito; their eyes are holden as at the first, so that they still see in Him no more than the sympathizing stranger, who has joined himself to them in the way. Much, no doubt, they must have wondered when they found in Him a scribe instructed to the kingdom; one who took the part of their former hopes against their present fears; one whose very rebukes, earnest as they were, must have been welcome; for it was their despair which He rebuked; and just so far as they acknowledged those rebukes to be just, their despair must have given place to hope, their sorrow have been turned into joy. ‘And He said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken.’ Some of the Scripture they had believed, as much as fell in with their preconceived notions, prejudices, and opinions; which is so often the way with us all; but not ‘all that the prophets had spoken.’ Man’s word, and woman’s word, and angels’ words, they had paid more or less heed to all these; but God’s word, that word which liveth and abideth for ever, they had not built and established themselves on it. Of that word they had not enquired, nor sought to learn from it how it should fare with the Christ of God; else they would have found that the very things over which they were mourning, as the defeat and discomfiture of all their high-raised expectations, had long ago, even from the beginning, been fore-announced and declared needful preliminaries to his entrance into his glory. They would there have learned that these sufferings and this death, so far from giving the lie to their Lord's pretensions as the Christ, were actually laid down in Scripture as things without the endurance of which the true signs of the Messiah would have been wanting in Him; that through the vestibule of death it was appointed for Him to pass into the palace of life: 'Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?' They hitherto had not spoken of Christ but in a roundabout manner, as 'He that should have redeemed Israel' (ver. 21); but the Lord at once employs this word which stood at the centre of all Jewish hopes. They err who conclude from hence that Christ had entered into his glory already; He did not do this till his Ascension, and this which He is speaking now is not history, but doctrine. Did not the Scripture announce a suffering Messiah before a reigning and glorious One?

'And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself' (cf. ver. 44; John i. 45; Acts xxvi. 22, 23; 1 Pet. i. 11). What, we may reverently enquire, were the passages to which the great Prophet of the New Covenant mainly referred, as having in Himself been fulfilled? And first, what prophecies of a suffering Messiah did He recognize and allow, claim in the books of Moses for his own? He began, as we can hardly doubt, with the prot-evangelium; the Seed of the woman, who should bruise the serpent's head, or, in other words, inflict on him a wound which should be deadly, was not Himself to escape unscathed altogether; this same serpent should bruise his heel (Gen. iii. 15). And then there were the types, claimed by the Lord in the days of his flesh, or by those who wrote concerning Him, as fulfilled in Him; the brazen serpent (Num. xxi. 9; John iii. 14); the paschal Lamb (Exod. xii. 46; John xix. 36); and as the types, so also the typical persons; Joseph, who from the lowest humiliation of the pit and the dungeon passed to the highest place of dignity and honour, even to the right hand of the throne; David, who suffered so much and so long from the persecutions of Saul—these, with many more. And when the august Interpreter of the things in Scripture concerning Himself reached the prophets, it can be little doubtful that the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah was the central prophecy which He expounded. Around this there would be grouped the great prophetic Psalms of the Crucifixion—the Psalms are specially referred to, not here, but ver. 44—as eminently the twenty-second, claimed by the Lord upon his cross (Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 24), and the fortieth, claimed in like manner for Him by his apostle (Heb. x. 5); then further Daniel ix. 26; and the book of the prophet Jonah; while Zechariah would prove rich in prophetic glimpses of all which had just on Calvary been fulfilled, as xii. 10; xiii. 7. These disciples had assumed that Jesus of Nazareth could not be the Christ, because He had suffered these things; the Lord shews them from all Scripture that He could not be the Christ, unless He had suffered these things.

And now, while He was still engaged in opening to them the Scriptures, 'they drew nigh unto the village, whither they went; and He made as though He would have gone further;' not, that is, pretended, but actually would have gone further, unless they had detained Him; by thus offering to proceed, proving them, whether his words had taken any mighty hold upon them or not; and whether there was any desire upon their part for further communion with Him (cf. Mark vi. 48). It was seen that there was so. Much they had heard, yet they evidently desired to hear still more. 'But they constrained Him, saying, Abide with us, for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And He went in to tarry with them'—to be their guest now, as two of their number at the outset of his ministry had been his (John i. 39).

'And it came to pass, as He sat at meat with them, He took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them.' He, in some sort the guest, assumes at once the place of the host, and, as at other times (Matt. xiv. 19; xv. 36; xxvi. 26), the prerogatives of the householder or goodman of the house, to whom this blessing and giving of thanks of right belonged. 'And their eyes were opened, and they knew Him; and He vanished out of their sight.' He was known to them, as they themselves report to the Eleven, 'in breaking of bread' (ver. 35). This might seem to imply that there was something in the act of breaking of bread by which they recognized at last with whom they had to do. At the same time the words, 'their eyes were opened,' going before 'they knew Him,' and put evidently as the condition of their knowing, imply that it was not a mere natural conclusion which they drew from something which they saw Him do, but a supernatural enlightenment, a ceasing of the condition indicated at ver. 16, where it is said, 'their eyes were holden.' But what was there, it may be asked, in this 'breaking of bread' by which they knew Him? Some answer that this was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist,¹ and that they recognized the form of consecrating words.

¹ Thus Augustine (Serm. 239): In panis fractione cognoscitur, quia ibi percipitur, ubi vita æterna percipitur.

But, in the first place, certainly these two were not present at the institution of the Holy Eucharist, for only apostles, which these are not, were there. And then, in the second place, it is an entirely gratuitous assumption that this was an Eucharistic celebration. Roman Catholics are fond of asserting that it was so, thus to find warrant and authority for reception under one kind, only bread being mentioned here. The blessing of the bread can of itself prove nothing. It is quite true that this is mentioned, and that it constituted an essential part of the Eucharistic celebration (Mark xiv. 22); but as at other times also He blessed the bread (Mark vi. 41), no argument can be drawn from hence; and for us the absence of one of the constituent elements of this sacrament may well be decisive that no such sacrament was here. The words can scarcely mean more than that at that solemn moment their Lord revealed to them who He was. The manner of his disappearance, like that of all his comings and goings after the Resurrection, is mysterious (John xx. 19, 26), and quite unlike anything which had found place before. His body, it is evident, was not any longer submitted to the same laws as those to which ours are submitted now, and to which his own had been hitherto submitted.

‘And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?’ They wonder that this had not enabled them long since to guess who it was that had thus been speaking with them. The nearest parallel to this of the heart burning within them may be found in the words of the Psalmist, ‘While I was musing, the fire burned; then spake I with my tongue’ (Ps. xxxix. 3).

With such tidings to tell, they do not tarry any longer at Emmaus. 'They rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them.' Yet if they imagined that they were the first to bring the glad tidings, in this they were disappointed—if disappointment it could be called; they did but contribute another stream to swell the great floodtide of joy, which every moment was rising higher and higher. They found the Eleven, and them that were with them, able to answer good tidings with good; nay, as it would seem, preventing their good tidings with those which they had themselves to tell, with evidence coming in from one quarter and another, and now from the very chief among themselves, that the barriers of the grave had indeed been broken, that their Lord was in truth that Conqueror of death, that Prince of life, which in their unbelieving ears He had proclaimed Himself to be: 'The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon' (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 5). And yet, anticipated though their tidings had been, every confirmation of a fact so marvellous, so far transcending all experience and all hope, must have been welcome; welcome therefore their confirmation of it, as they threw their symbol into the common stock of hope ripening now into glorious certainty, as 'they told what things were done in the way, and how He was known of them in breaking of bread.'¹

¹ This Scripture, besides its literal and historic meaning, may possibly have a symbolic meaning as well. Such Hugh of St. Victor has traced in it (Miscel. i. 100): Jesus in viâ ambulantibus faciem suam abscondit, ostensus eam in patriâ. Propterea in fine viæ cum discumbere cœpissent, fregit Jesus panem ut interiora ejus patescerent, et ibi eum agnoverunt, quia post vitæ hujus cursum in regno cælorum cum Abraham et Isaac et Jacob discumbentes, et super mensam ejus edentes et bibentes in æterno convivio, Jesu

claritatem videbunt. Nunc autem interim in viâ peregrinus apparet, ut exilium nostrum agnoscamus, et quod alia est patria nostra. Et colloquendo corda ad amorem inflamat, sed oculos ad contemplationem adhuc non revelat. Qui ergo in viâ ex sermonibus Jesu ignem amoris corde concipiunt, in fine viæ claritatem ejus videbunt. Sunt itaque linguæ igneæ quæ veniunt ad nos; et verba flammantia quotidie Christum nobis loquentem audimus; quia spiritum Christi non habet, qui verba Christi audiendo non ardet. I will fill this page with one quotation more from the same illustrious theologian, its right to a place here consisting in the commentary which it supplies to those words of the disciples, 'Did not our heart burn within us?' though indeed I am more tempted to quote it as a magnificent specimen of what mediæval Latin in the hands of a great master, who had some great truth to set forth, could accomplish (In Eccles. Hom. 1): In meditatione quasi quædam lucta est ignorantis cum scientiâ, et lumen veritatis quodammodo in mediâ caligine erroris emicat; velut ignis in ligno viridi, primo quidem difficile apprehendit, sed cum flatu vehementer excitatus fuerit, et acrius in subjectam materiam exardescere cœperit, tunc magnos quosdam fumosæ caliginis globos exurgere, et ipsam adhuc modicæ scintillationis flammam rarius interlucentem obvolvère videmus: donec tandem, paulatim crescente incendio, vapore omni exhausto et caligine disjectâ, splendor serenus appareat. Tunc victrix flamma in omnem crepitantis rogi congeriem discurrens, libere dominatur; subjectamque materiam circumvolitans, ac molli tactu perstringens lambendo exurit ac penetrat: nec prius quiescit, quam interna penetrando succedens totum quodammodo traxerit in se, quod invenit præter se. Postquam autem incendio id quod exurendum est concrematum a snâ quodammodo naturâ totum in ignis similitudinem proprietatemque transierit, tunc omnis fragor decedit et strepitus sopitur, atque illa flammæ spicula e medio sublata tolluntur, sævusque ille et vorax ignis, cunctis sibi subjectis et amicâ quâdam similitudine concorporatis, in altâ se pace silentioque componit; quia jam non invenit nec diversum aliquid præter se, nec adversum contra se. . . . Sic nimirum carnale cor, quasi lignum viride, et necdum ab humore carnalis concupiscentiæ exsiccatum, si quando aliquam divini timoris seu dilectionis scintillam conceperit, primum quidem pravis desideriis reluctantibus passionum et perturbationum fumus exoritur; deinde, roboratâ mente, cum flamma amoris et validius ardere et clarius splendere cœperit, mox omnis perturbationum caligo evanescit; et jam purâ mente animus ad contemplationem veritatis se diffundit. Novissime autem, postquam assiduâ veritatis contemplatione cor penetratum fuerit, et ad ipsum summæ veritatis fontem medullitus toto animæ affectu intraverit, tunc in idipsum dulcedinis quasi totum ignitum, et in ignem amoris conversum, ab omni strepitu et perturbatione pacatissimum requiescit.

Oct 21

